PREFACE.

THE basis of this work, a thin duodecimo volume published in 1836 under the title of a "Medical Vocabulary", originated in my annoying experience, as a Medical Student, of the need of such a help. It was intended for those who, like myself, failed to profit by the instructions of the class-room, because necessarily conveyed in technical language, which, in many instances, no appliance of classical attainments nor stretch of the imagination could render intelligible. With all its imperfections,—and I regret that in the excitement of preparing it for the press and myself for examination, it contained not a few,—its plan and purpose met with approbation. Having soon afterwards entered into practice, I probably might have contented myself with issuing a mere corrected reprint as often as required; but Medical Terminology was being constantly added to, and it was proper to keep pace with its progress. Besides, the working out of my task had made manifest a long array of existing errors, inaccuracies, and defects, in general as well as in medical scientific nomenclature; a strong desire to correct which, and to atone for my own shortcomings, grew and increased till it became irrepressible. In addition, my small anonymous book received flattering commendation, not only from fellow students, but from professional men, clerical and legal, as well as medical. All this determined the remodelling of the "Medical Vocabulary", the altering and enlarging of its plan, so as to constitute a work of greater—far more comprehensive usefulness.

This resolution gained strength from consideration of the general incomprehensibility of the technical language of medicine and its collateral branches, much of which unavoidably enters into the medical testimony at coroners' inquests in England and Ireland, or the corresponding investigations by public officers in Scotland, and at their consequent criminal trials, forming important ingredients in that mingled association of law and medicine designated Medical Jurisprudence, or Forensic Medicine. All such technicalities are as a dead letter, not only to simple jurors, but often to learned judges, barristers, advocates, coroners, sheriffs, and every legal functionary whose education has not been to some extent medical. How much more so to the general community. The same may be said of a great portion of the technical language of General Science.

Agreeably to the plan sketched out, the Expository Lexicon has enormously outgrown the dimensions of its humble precursor. The plan was by no means in a complete state at the outset, but received extensions and amendments gradually, as they suggested themselves under a discovered necessity. In the slow progress of this amplification, I had to transcribe my entire MS. (as it existed on each occasion) four times, in order to find my way among the mass of accumulations. Above twenty-eight years have glided past since its commencement; but it is to be understood that it engaged only those hours which a medical practitioner could afford out of active professional duties (it never having been allowed to interfere with prompt obedience to the very humblest call), or snatch from "society" and from sleep. Dreary as the self-imposed task may seem, so much are we swayed by habit that it long ago became as a pleasing relaxation from the dull realities of plodding life, rather than a weariness. Whatever may be the opinion formed of its completion and the time expended in its progress, I have the fullest conviction that no man, however superior in ability, could accomplish the same object with less hard work, or in less time; just for the reason touched on, that it was by progressive development through that long series of years that it attained its present condition. Again, I think it right to state that in the four transcriptions of the MS., in the immense bulk of additional matter, even to the last, and in the multitudinous copyings of alterations, improvements, and mutual references, no other man's aid was had recourse to for a single word; and this is mentioned, not in idle boasting, but only to express a farther conviction that division of labour, in such a case, would be detrimental to success; that the mind and pen of one man were much more likely to carry out the intended purpose, and its countless intricacies, with uniformity and completeness.

Hitherto, no similar work has existed in English, nor—with reference to its peculiar arrangement, distinctiveness, and extent,—so far as I know, in any other language. More minute attention has been bestowed on etymology and accentuation than is given any where else; from a belief that the prominent features of derivation, like those of the human face, serve essentially, to the student and the reader, the important purposes of remembrance and recognition. Apology may seem due for the boldness with which some novel views of the grammatical character, construction, and precise signification, of a large number of compound Greek and Latin derivative terms, have been acted on and recommended for adoption: also, for the introduction of a series of terminals, viz., -adæ, -idæ, -ida, -ides, -ide -ideus, -odes, -ate, -ite, -itis, -ic, -ous, -icus, -ismus, -igo, etc., as means of simplifying and avoiding repetition: for the numerous notes and references, inserted in the hope of rendering the explanations more clear, to those who will take the trouble of their perusal: and for the host of departures from the beaten track (in some directions) ventured on throughout the work; the whole forming deep inroads on custom, which, it may be judged, no slight grounds could have warranted. They were not made in a presumptuous or dogmatic spirit, but on deliberate reflection, matured through a lengthened period, in which the whole subject was continually before my mind. Nor was I disposed to rely on my own judgment alone, but appealed to every available printed authority, to friends and strangers, literary men, scholars, authors, teachers, and professors, classical and medical—all to little purpose.* May I not claim indulgence in giving effect to my own convictions, only after having invited the criticism, and craved, publicly and privately, though vainly, the judgment of others, for my guidance?

As to what may be termed the subject matter of the work, and lest I should be gravely charged with plagiarism (the commission of which, in a certain sense, is inevitable in a production of this kind), I confess to have drawn information from every source within reach and suited to my purpose. That these innumerable appropriations are not, except in a few instances, more directly acknowledged, is, because to have done so, generally, must have cumbered my pages with men's names.

To my much respected friends, Dr. W. A. Greenhill of Hastings, and Dr. Alexander Henry of London, my grateful acknowledgments are due: to the former, for his kind and valuable supervision of every line in these sheets as they passed through the press, with special reference to their classical correctness; to the latter, for a similar general scrutiny. Whatever may be the faults, however, in the plan or the execution of the work; whatever slips may have been made, or typographical errors have crept in—and will it surprise, if, in illustrating some 50,000 distinct terms not similarly treated in any other work, English or foreign, any such be discovered?—they are not attributable to my esteemed friends.

To those who honoured me as subscribers, the great, the good, the generous, whose liberal-minded confidence encouraged me to embark and persevere in so weighty an enterprise,—and to all who from time to time, during the issue of the several parts, gratified and cheered me by their warm expressions of commendation (hundreds of such written testimonies are in my possession), I again return my sincere, heart-felt thanks.

R. G. MAYNE.

EXPLANATION OF THE ARRANGEMENT ADOPTED.

No mere English or Latin word is admitted to the rank of a principal term unless it, its analogue, or synonyme, has a special application in some branch of science. Every general term at present in use, and every newly created term, as well as every ancient term still recognised in medical and general scientific literature, is carefully defined and explained.

Each name, term, or phrase in English has its pronunciation indicated by the acute accent; in Latin, its syllables have the long, or short mark, as ā or ă. If Latin, simple or compound, its declension or its grammatical character is added; next (within brackets), its derivation, and the grounds thereof, where the connexion with the etymon may not be conspicuous; then follows its ordinary meaning, if it have such,—the branch of science, in italics, in which it is more particularly used, its special definition and application in that branch, its various synonymes, and, lastly, the strictly analogous term, where it exists in English, with a reference to those terms, synonymous or not, where further illustration or connexion will be found. If an English word, the same order is observed, except that its Latin analogue, declension, or character occur last.

The full explanation is added to that word or term most in use (so far as this can be decided on), whether Latin or English, those corresponding bearing reference to it merely, as "Aliment," which is much more common than its analogue, Alimentum, or its synonyme, Pabulum.

Any term or phrase comprising a proper name, or an adjective formed from a proper name, is explained under that name or adjective, as "Willis, Circle of," or "Highmorianum, Corpus."

A vast number of Latin terms differ from their English analogues only in the terminating syllable, or even letter, as "Chronicus, chronic," "Adversifolius, adversifoliate," "Combinatio, combination," "Herbaceus, herbaceous," "Sulphas, sulphate," "Apathia, apathy," "Gustatorius, gustatory," "Arytænoides, arytenoid," "Lenticularis, lenticular," "Appetitus, appetite," "Morphia, morphin," etc., only the one or other of which is introduced as a principal term. By attending to this simple fact, either the Latin or the English form of every such term may be at once found. In similar manner, the series of Latin terms which are applied to distinguish Classes and Orders of plants are entered in their proper character of adjectives: thus, Cryptogamia, which is but the nom. pl. n. of an adjective, will be found explained under Cryptogamius, instead of being ranked separately as a noun f., as has been erroneously done; and so of many other terms in a like situation. But of all Latin names and synonymes, whose meaning is expressed by English words differing from them in form, both synonymes are inserted in their respective places, as Cerebrum, and brain; Hepar, and liver, etc.

Opinions of the "Expository Lexicon."

"Oxford, April 30, 1851.

"Having been requested to express my opinion of an 'Expository Lexicon,' or, 'Terminological Dictionary of Medicine,' etc., about to be published by Dr. Mayne of Leeds, I have great pleasure in stating, that, judging from a portion of the work which I have seen, it promises to be a work of the highest value, especially as such a work is much wanted. "J. KIDD, M.D., F.R.S."

"Cambridge, May 21, 1851.

"The work, 'An Expository Lexicon of Terms in Science,' which Dr. Mayne has it in contemplation to publish, I believe to be a great desideratum, and one that will be found especially useful by members of the medical profession; and, judging from Dr. Mayne's 'Dissertation on Scientific Nomenclature,' I conceive there is every reason to expect that in his hands its execution and compass will fully be equal to the requirements of the subjects, and the work be found most acceptable to the scientific world in general. "HENRY J. H. BOND, M.D.,
"Regius Professor of Medicine of the "University of Cambridge."

"12, Old Burlington Street, May 15, 1851.

"From the specimen I have seen of Dr. Mayne's 'Expository Lexicon,' I can have no doubt that the work, if completed on the same plan, will be a most valuable addition to English medical literature, and will be of very essential service to all students of the medical sciences in this country. "JOHN FORBES, M.D., F.R.S."

"Edinburgh, 51, Queen Street, May 15, 1851.

"Dear Sir.—I have perused your specimen of the 'Expository Lexicon' with much interest. Its plan is admirable; and, if conducted with the talent, erudition, and skill which the specimen seems to vouch for, it cannot fail to prove a most important and valuable addition to the scientific literature of this country. Wishing you every success and encouragement in your great work, "I am, dear Sir, very truly yours,

"Hastings, May 12, 1851.

"I know that Dr. Mayne has, for some years, been employed on a Dictionary of Medical Terms, and I have examined a printed specimen of the work. I think that such a dictionary is likely to be useful in this country, and that Dr. Mayne's promises to be, in several respects, superior to any similar work in the English language with which I am at present acquainted. "W. A. GREENHILL, M.D., Oxon."

"Edinburgh, May 14, 1851.

"Sir,—I have examined the specimen of the 'Expository Lexicon,' which you propose to publish by subscription, and I think that it promises to be a useful work, especially to those who wish to become acquainted with the meaning of scientific terms. "I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,
"J. H. BALFOUR, M.D.,
"Professor of Medicine and Botany."

"Having had the pleasure of reading a 'Dissertation on Scientific Nomenclature' by Dr. Mayne, and otherwise become acquainted with his views respecting the improvement of the technical language of the physical sciences, I am convinced that his proposed work on that subject will prove very useful to naturalists and others; both in directing them in the choice of terms to express new ideas and objects, and in tending to improve the established or current nomenclature, which is generally admitted to be in many respects defective. Dr. Mayne's 'Expository Lexicon' must greatly improve the taste of nomenclators; and were attention directed to grammatical accuracy by such works, the objectionable names in use, and daily increasing, would not be tolerated. "W. MACGILLIVRAY,
"Marischal College, Aberdeen, June 7, 1851." "Professor of Natural History."

"We have very carefully examined the first part of Dr. Mayne's Lexicon; and we have great pleasure in expressing our high and unqualified admiration of the manner in which it is executed. From the comprehensive character of the plan which the author has adopted, this Lexicon is suited to the requirements of every educated gentleman It embraces 'the correct pronunciation, derivation, definition, and application of the names, analogues, synonymes, and phrases (in English, Latin, Greek, French, and German) connected with Medicine, and employed in Anatomy, Animal Pathology, Astronomy, Botany, Chemistry, Comparative Anatomy, Conchology, Crystallography, Entomology, Geography, Geology, Geometry, Ichthyology, Materia Medica, Medical Jurisprudence or Forensic Medicine, Medicine, Microscopy, Mineralogy, Natural History, Natural Philosophy, Nosology, Obstetricy, Ornithology, Pathological Anatomy, Pathology, Pharmacy, Phrenology, Physiology, Surgery, Trigonometry, and Zoology. We hope that the extraordinary industry and erudition displayed in this work may be rewarded by an extensive sale. While it is peculiarly adapted to the medical profession, it must prove equally useful to all scientific men, as well as to lawyers and coroners."—Association Medical Journal, November 4th, 1853.

"We have given the title of Dr. Mayne's Lexicon in full, in order to state that, in the part before us, which extends from A to CAM, the promise of the title page appears to be very fully accomplished. * * * * As no similar work exists in English, we believe it will prove a most valuable addition to the literature of our language."—Medical Times and Gazette, November 19th, 1853.

Opinions of the "Lexicon."

"There are few men to whom the Republic of Letters are more indebted than to the compilers of Lexicons, Dictionaries, and Cyclopædias, provided that they do their work well and completely. The important work undertaken by Dr. Mayne is commenced on a scale as comprehensive as can be desired; and as far as it goes, it is well executed. It is compiled with great care, and beautifully printed. There are three or four classes to whom it will be most useful. To Authors, Editors, and Reviewers, it will become a necessary vade mecum; to the Medical Profession, and to naturalists, it will be equally essential; and to clergymen, tutors, and lawyers, it will be found exceedingly useful and convenient. The technical terms of science, especially of medical science, have multiplied so much of late, that the want of such a glossary has been extensively complained of, and we trust the indefatigable author will meet with the encouragement he deserves. The work is published by subscription, in six quarterly parts, price 5s. each, and it appears already to have obtained the patronage of a numerous and respectable body of subscribers, including Prince Albert and the Lord Chief Justice. We regret to have observed in this list so few of the names of the clergy, a class to whom the Lexicon would be more useful than they may be aware of. It is common for preachers to illustrate moral and spiritual truths by allusions to medical science and natural history, and strange havoc they sometimes commit among nerves and arteries, muscles and tendons. Nor would our Judges or Barristers be any the less qualified for their grave responsibilities if they were less ignorant than they often prove themselves to be of medical terms. It is often difficult for a medical witness to express his meaning accurately in terms more general than those familiar to his own profession, and the Judge at least should understand them, if only that he might be able to check the ignorant or wilful misrepresentation of the evidence into which barristers are sometimes betrayed. Dr. Mayne has been engaged in the preparation of this work upwards of twenty years, and, as far as we can learn, the sample now published has given every satisfaction."—The Critic, London Literary Journal, December 1st, 1853.

"Many years ago a small volume, under the title of the 'Medical Vocabulary,' giving an explanation of scientific and technical terms, was published anonymously by the author of this Dictionary, and at the same time, was much esteemed by students and practitioners, and frequently consulted as a work of reference. The volume has been long out of print, and the author observes, 'he might probably have rested content with issuing a mere corrected reprint as often as called for.' 'Its favourable reception, however, by the learned in other professions than his own; its approval by Reviewers, together with the fact that new scientific terms, requiring explanation, were constantly being created, stimulated to endeavours to render it more comprehensive; and, while carefully maintaining its original purpose of a Medical Dictionary, to adapt it to the use not only of those professions, but also of the scientific, and of the educated classes generally.' According to the terms of the prospectus, the work is to be published in six quarterly parts, forming one thick octavo volume. The first part, now before us, comes down to the letter C. The plan of the work appears to us to be exceedingly good; its arrangement is an improvement upon that of other works of its class, and judging from the specimen now before us, it promises, when completed, to supply a deficiency in medical literature which has long been felt."—Dublin Medical Press, December 21st, 1853.

"Dr. Mayne has been engaged for many years in the preparation of this Lexicon, but the great expense attending the publication of a work of this kind has hitherto delayed its appearance. The present part is the first of six, and reaches to the beginning of the letter C. We have looked through it, and can safely say that if Dr. Mayne can carry out the rest of his work in the same way, he will have conferred an advantage on science generally, and especially on medicine."—British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review, January 1854.

"We have transcribed the greater part of the lengthy title prefixed to Dr. Mayne's work, because by so doing we shall best acquaint our readers with the design of his laborious undertaking. It is evident that such a work as he promises must, if well done, be one of vast utility and importance to all engaged in medical literature, whether as readers or as writers; and so far as the part at present published goes, it appears to us most ably and correctly compiled. Some idea of its copiousness may be formed when we state that, according to a rough calculation we have made, the letter A alone contains about 3000 headings, and the explanations appended to each term are not mere definitions, but, in most instances, include much descriptive and valuable information. It is proposed to complete the work in six quarterly parts, to be published at an extremely moderate price."—Dublin Quarterly Journal, 1st February, 1854.

"The Second Part of Dr. Mayne's Expository Lexicon of the Terms, Ancient and Modern, in Medical and General Science, has just made its appearance; and the best compliment we can pay it is to assure our readers that it is in no respect inferior to the First. The same care and accuracy, the same fulness of knowledge, the same intelligible and condensed definition, appear in every page. From what we hear of the success of this work, we judge it likely to be out of print long before the whole is published."—Critic, London Literary Journal, Feb. 1st, 1854.

"There are few medical men who do not, at some time or other, require a dictionary of medical terms, with their derivation, synonymes, and definition. The work of Dr. Mayne is admirably calculated to supply their wants. The mode of printing the terms in well-marked thick capitals, whereby they readily catch the eye, the accuracy of the details, and the general literary merits of the book, must ensure for this publication a large amount of patronage.'—Monthly Journal, New Series, March 1854.

"The third part of Dr. Mayne's Expository Lexicon is published, and so far the early promise is well fulfilled. We find no falling off, no signs of carelessness; the same fulness, classical correctness, scientific accuracy, and laborious research are visible in every page. In short, we have heard but one opinion of the work. No library, even on the domestic scale, will be complete without it."—Critic, August 15th, 1854.

"Having already expressed a very favourable opinion of this learned work, we need only add that the second and third parts quite confirm the impression we received from looking over the first. As a book of reference its utility is unquestionable, and we feel assured that if completed as it has been begun and carried on hitherto, it will be a most valuable addition to the Medical Literature of our language."—Medical Times and Gazette, November 18th, 1854.

"Considering its merits and value, we blame ourselves for not having noticed this work sooner. It is an aid very much wanted at present by practitioners, students, teachers, and writers, when the technical language of Medical Science, and the branches of knowledge subservient to it, has become so enormously expanded, that few can keep pace with its progress. Indeed we can scarcely understand how the readers of our Journals can comprehend the meaning of writers, so completely have the terms of art been changed and multiplied, and the modes of expression so metamorphosed. We would not say that we have to congratulate our brethren on this result; on the contrary, we have to express our regret at it, for it affords proof of our pedantic propensities, but it being so, we have to enlist our readers as supporters of Dr. Mayne's undertaking; for assuredly, by promoting it, they will promote their own comfort, as regards their literary pursuits. Such compilations, we need not say, are not now made for the first time; we have enjoyed the advantages of them for a long time, especially in the French and German languages; but a new one is now absolutely necessary for English students, and the condensed one before us is therefore opportune. * * * * The three numbers published, embrace all the terms from A to H inclusive, and contain 456 pages of excellent type and paper; indeed the judicious typographical mechanism of the work, adds greatly to its value as a book for consultation. If, as we believe, we are indebted to Dr. Mayne's spirit of enterprise for this timely contribution to medical literature, he deserves encouragement, and in no way can that be afforded more effectually than by ordering the book as advertised."—Dublin Medical Press, January 17th, 1855.

Opinions of the "Lexicon."

"Part III of this excellent work takes us almost to the end of the letter H, and we anticipate that the author can have little difficulty in concluding his work in six parts as originally proposed. We shall examine the whole work critically when finished, and shall now only repeat the very favourable opinion which the perusal of the first part led us to form."—British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review, January 1855.

"The Fourth Part of Dr. Mayne's Expository Lexicon is just published, and well sustains the high character of the publication. We can only express our earnest hope that the Editor may meet with such encouragement as he deserves, and that he may thus be enabled to complete the work within a reasonable time. * * * * It has been justly remarked, that by far the most valuable portion of every gentleman's library consists of well compiled lexicons, dictionaries, and cyclopædias, and yet they are published not only as cheap as other books, but when we consider the labour involved and other peculiar expenses of these publications, we may say that nothing that issues from the press is half so cheap. We trust that not only the profession, but the public, will prove that their opinion coincides with ours by immediately becoming subscribers. The high testimonials of such men as Dr. Kidd of Oxford, Dr. Bond of Cambridge, and Sir John Forbes, M.D., F.R.S., prove that our opinion is sustained by those who have the best possible qualifications for forming an estimate of the value of such a work."—Critic, 1st March, 1855.

"We are glad to see that another part of this very learned work has appeared. The present part consists of one hundred and fifty-two pages, and includes all words between 'Hydrinus' and 'Lithologia.' Those not familiar with Dr. Mayne's Lexicon will understand its scope from the following extracts. * * * * Its completeness gives to this work a very high value. We recommend it strongly to the consideration of our readers."—Medical Times and Gazette, March 24th, 1855.

"We have waited until the work before us has made some progress before venturing to give an opinion as to its merits. It has attained the fourth number, and advanced to the middle of the letter L. We are able to bestow upon Dr. Mayne's labours the most unqualified approbation. So needful is the work here undertaken, and so admirably executed the task, that we doubt not its publication will eventually be as satisfactory in a commercial point of view, as it now is in respect to the author's scholarship and professional reputation. This is expressing much in its favour, but not more than is just. So good is the book, that in spite of what many will deem its 'dry subject,' of the limited sale existing among the profession for works of high literary reputation, and the little attraction such an expenditure of talent, time, and money, ordinarily presents to the book-buying public, we believe this 'Expository Lexicon' will gradually force itself into a very wide circulation, and be eventually regarded as the 'Liddell and Scott' of the writers in the Medical Sciences."—Lancet, April 21st, 1855.

"The sixth part of this valuable Lexicon extends from the 761 to the 912 page, and the letters neu to per. The care evinced in the preparation of the earlier parts is fully kept up as the work advances towards completion, and justifies the opinion we have before expressed, that it will prove a most useful addition to medical literature."—Medical Times and Gazette, October 17th, 1857.

"A sixth part of Dr. Mayne's useful Lexicon lies before us. It has now reached to part of the way through the letter P, and we trust to see another portion of the work before long. As to its execution, we can only speak of it in the same terms of praise as on previous occasions."—British Medical Journal, October 17th, 1857.

"We announce with much pleasure the appearance of a new portion of this very able Lexicon. We had almost given up hope of its appearance and continuance, but now look forward to its completion with all confidence. The present and sixth part extends from Neurectopicus to Periphacitis. As we before said, Dr. Mayne's Dictionary will stand alone in our language in its completeness of performance."—Lancet, October 17th, 1857.

"This part includes the terms from Rabies to Strobiliferus. As the work is so nearly approaching to completion, we may express a confident opinion that it will prove of most essential service to the medical profession, and superior to any similar work."—Medical Times and Gazette, January 8th, 1858.

"A work to which there is no equal in the English language."—Edinburgh Medical Journal, July 1858.

"This elaborate and useful work is advancing steadily towards completion. It possesses the same evidence of hard work and accuracy on the part of Dr. Mayne as have characterised the former parts of his Expository Lexicon."—British Medical Journal.

"The work is now rapidly advancing towards completion. It is still carried on with the same care which distinguish the earlier parts."—Medical Times and Gazette, October 9th, 1858.

"We would remind all engaged in scientific pursuits having any connexion with medicine, that a seventh part of Dr. Mayne's Lexicon has lately appeared. There is no other work of the kind to be put in comparison with it, and its present purchase we hold to be a good investment. The portion before us includes terms from Periphacos to Rabidus, and stretches to page 1064 of the Dictionary. * * * * We presume the work will yet require two more portions to complete it. If so, it is an extension not in the least to be regretted, taking all things into consideration."—Lancet, November 27th, 1858.

"We are glad to be able to announce the issue of another portion of Dr. Mayne's valuable Dictionary. This the eighth part carries us from Rabies to Strobiliferus, and attains the 1216 page. We hope soon to witness the completion of this laborious undertaking which speaks so well for the industry and learning of its enterprising author."—Lancet, January 29th, 1859.

"The Dictionary contains a large amount of information, well arranged, and very accessible; and we have little doubt that it will soon come to be regarded as a necessary appendage to the library table of every man of science and scientific dilettante."—Medico-Chirurgical Review, January 1860.

DISSERTATION ON SCIENTIFIC NOMENCLATURE,

MEDICAL AND GENERAL.

(Abridged from the more extended pamphlet published in 1849.)

INTRODUCTION.

Having been long engaged in endeavouring to improve the objectionable condition of Medical and General Scientific Terminology, and, as far as practicable, bring it under the regulation of classic laws, the endless investigations necessarily attendant upon the prosecution of my purpose unveiled many defects, inaccuracies, errors and discrepancies, which otherwise might have escaped notice, or severally have been considered too trivial for interference. To those who casually stumble on a single flaw, such a purpose may seem finical rather than useful; but if it be considered that those defects, inaccuracies, etc., amount to thousands,—their number is constantly increasing,—that they are in daily use in lectures, examinations and conversation,—that they occur in works on almost every branch of science, —that they sometimes enter into the illustrations of the pulpit, the deliberations of the bench, the pleadings of the bar, the theses of the University, and the prelections of the class-room,—that they are found in text-book, and manual, and in dictionaries of the highest pretensions,—the importance of the subject cannot be doubted.

It is right to state, that I consulted men of the highest literary rank, as well as friends of good acquirements, clerical, medical, and scientific. Some bluntly assailed my suggestions as monstrous; others assented too readily to everything; certain granted it possible I might be right, but guardedly as needlessly requested that the sanction of their names should not be made use of. A few, (doubtless they were the "judicious") after particularly attending to the arguments pro and con, honoured the former with unqualified approbation. While scarcely one would hazard an opinion of his own, nearly all scouted the terms of science as barbarous, being "found in no classical works," an assertion neither literally true nor fairly made, but, so far as it may be the one or the other, easily met by the fact that science, in every branch, has taken such giant strides since the days of "the Class," that it demanded and has formed almost a language for itself.

DIVISION I.

COMPRISING TERMS COMMON TO MEDICAL AND GENERAL SCIENCE.

Section I.—Of Terms from the Greek ending in -ĭdēs and -ide.

Many hundreds of Latin terms thus formed exist, as Clino-ides (Κλίνη and εἶδος), Delto-ides, Hyalo-ides, etc. The terminal dissyllable being preceded, with few exceptions, by the letter o, is erroneously pronounced in this country as if the o and i were intended to produce a diphthongal sound -oides, a mispronunciation induced probably by the mode of uttering their English analogues, which is certainly of that character, as Clinoid, Deltoid, Hyaloid, etc. The o, however, forms no part of their penultimate syllable, but is placed after the first portion of the compound term, as a convenient link connecting it with the terminal; while the long ī of the latter is the proper conversion of ει, in εἶδος, into Latin. Accordingly, the few examples found in Greek Lexicons are invariably spelt as in Δενδροειδής. What is their grammatical character, and what their exact English signification? Such as appear in Greek Lexicons are presented as adjective. In Latin Classical Dictionaries they are given without any sign of their quality whatever: I have met with only one exception, entered thus, "Sphæroeides, adj.," on the authority of Boëtius and Vitruvius. In medical dictionaries there is the same absence of indication of their character; for instance, the terms adduced for illustration are disposed of in this way,—"Clinoid" is shown to be the English of Clinoides, and its etyma are given, but not a hint of its quality or status in grammar. "Deltoides" is truly enough stated to be synonymous with Deltoides, but is also said to be so with Deltoideus, (an error afterwards noticed Div. i. s. ii.); next comes its derivation, but no allusion to rank, nor the slightest trace of its familiar analogue "deltoid;" then it is stated to be the name of a muscle. "Hyaloid" is rendered Hyaloides, but is otherwise equally uninstructive.* Thus also, the compilers of English Dictionaries have transferred the analogues of such terms, with all their faults, just as they found them.

Lexicographers, whether medical, classical, or scientific, appear to have avoided a subject, which, perhaps, they cared not to take the trouble of investigating, or, finding it involved in some obscurity, chose to let matters remain as they were rather than hazard a reputation for learning by acting on any impression of their own. Wherefore, and having, as already stated, derived no enlightenment from the learned living, I present my own views. In Greek Lexicons, the original terms are adjective, and rendered, "having the likeness," figure "of," or "like to," some object denoted by the first portion of the epithet, as in the example, Δελτοειδὴς, to the Greek letter Δ, or a triangle, or, as actually applied in botany, to a trowel. Their Latin analogues are adjectives of one termination in -es, such having very rarely the neuter plural, and seldom or never the neuter singular.† Thus we have Mastoides (processus) masculine, Sigmoides (flexura) feminine, and Cuboides (os) neuter, and, where necessary to use them in the plural, recourse has been had to the expedient of forming other adjectives from them ending in -ideus (Div. i. s. ii.), as Sesamoidea (ossa), etc.

It has been objected to this view that Castellus, under the word Sesamoidea, adds its Greek original, σησαμοειδέα, which can only be regarded as the nom. pl. n. of σησαμοειδὴς, and hence, Sesamoidea is not the parallel case of Sesamoideus, but of Sesamoides. Now, with all the force that can be given to this fact, even if it were as substantial as my objectors suppose, it amounts to very little; only that Castellus, when defining Sesamoidea, put down in this, as in similar instances, the corresponding Greek word, with no special reference, however, to their exact resemblance, which was a mere coincidence, and then proceeded to explain its application to the ossicula of the hand and foot. His account of the Sesamoidea ossa is drawn from certain passages in the works of Galen and Bartholin‡, where this expression has been employed; but the bare circumstance of its employment does not tend one step to prove Sesamoidea to be the nom. pl. n. of Σησαμοειδὴς or its Latin analogue, Sesamoides. On the contrary, it distinctly proves its adoption as that case of a Latin adjective in -ideus. Admitting that Sesamoides is but the transcription of Σησαμοειδὴς, still, so soon as enlisted into the Latin, it became amenable to the rules and government of that language as an adjective of one termination, and though Σησαμοειδέα is truly the nom. pl. n. of the former, no analogous termination is to be met with in any case of the latter; therefore, whether we look to the fact of its ending in -idea, or to its application in agreement with ossa and other Latin nouns neuter, as will presently be shown, it cannot justly be regarded in any light but that of the nom. pl. n. of Sesamoideus.

No parallel example of the same case of any other Greek adjective in -ειδὴς being linked to a Latin noun and disguised in a different type, yet supposed to preserve its identity, is to be found in the old medical authors. Indeed, there is an irksome confusion in the very idea of such an anomaly. Had it really been intended to render the n. pl. of the Greek adjective in Roman or italic letters, and nothing more, the noun to which it is joined in the original, ὀστέα, ought also to have been dealt with in the same manner and made to appear as ostea, instead of presenting a mongrel association of the indisputably Latin ossa, with the alleged Italico-Greek Sesamoidea, between which, as words of different languages, there could be no true grammatical union or agreement. Again, the same word, Sesamoidea, is applied to the corpora, or small hard bodies of the semilunar valves of the aorta and pulmonary artery. Here, surely, it cannot be considered as still the Greek word in mask; and this analogy indicates, at least, that the author who first used this term, estimated and employed it according to my view. But further, that not only did Castellus himself regard it in this light, but that he must have understood the authority he quoted to have done the same, is clearly demonstrated by the fact that, in explaining the term Albadara, he states it to be the Arabic name "Ossiculi sesamoidei," thus again employing—not the fancied Greek word whether in Roman or italic dress, for no such termination as -idei comes from Σησαμοειδὴς—but incontrovertibly the same Latin adjective, Sesamoideus, now used in the genitive sing. n. Turton evidently understood it in the same way; for in referring to the same application of the term, he explains Sesamoideus as "applied to the numerous little bones of the toes and fingers, from their resemblance to grains of Indian corn." But whatever value may be accorded to this somewhat lengthened defence, the objection which called it forth cannot affect, cannot apply to the great number of similar terms in constant use.

The terminal -ide, as a derivative of εἶδος, occurs in a few terms, as Cancroide, Deltoide,

* Hooper. † Edwards' Eton Latin Grammar, Valpy's Latin Grammar, Hickies' ditto, ditto.

Kiloide, etc., in respect to which it is only necessary to say, they are from the French; that -ide is but -ides in Gallic dress, and that they need not be adopted by English writers.

Section II.—Of terms, formed from Greek derivatives, ending in -īdeus.

The change of the final syllable -es, of terms in -īdes into -eus, seems to be merely an imitation of the familiar Latin termination of an adjective in -us of the first and second declensions, and so, distinct from the similar termination of the Greek -ειος: in the former, the penult being short by position; in the latter, long, but by a confounding of the two in their respective compounds, they are generally pronounced as if Deltoidēus, Mastoidēus, etc.

Terms so derived and formed never can be correctly regarded as synonymes of those on which they are modelled. Each has the simple adjective quality, of or belonging to, whatever be the object to which its prototypal term in -īdes is applied. Each signifies, not resemblance to a thing, but relation to that which bears such resemblance. This is made plain in our English translation of terms in -ideus, by adopting so far a literal and very convenient analogue: for example, "Arytenoi'dean" (that of Arytænoideus), which does not mean "Arytenoid," or funnel-shaped, as it would if synonymous, but, pertaining to that which is arytenoid, or funnel-shaped. Their substitution for their originals, therefore, to convey the quality specially belonging to the latter, is erroneous. Thus, Hooper gives "Ma'stoid (Mastoideus; from μαστος, a breast, and ειδος, resemblance), nipple-like. 1. Those processes of bone are so termed that are shaped like the nipple of the breast, as the mastoid process of the temporal bone, etc. 2. The name of a muscle, from its being inserted into the mastoid process," etc. Here is a confused and contradictory jumble of what ought to have been kept separate and distinct. Mastoid is given as synonymous with Mastoideus, both are applied to a process of bone, both are the name of a muscle. The remarkable protuberance of the temporal bone is aptly called mastoid, but cannot be termed mastoidean, for it does not pertain to a nipple-like object, but is itself strikingly of that form; the muscle referred to, again, does pertain to a nipple-like object, and therefore is most fitly termed mastoidean, but has not the slightest likeness to a nipple, so cannot be called mastoid. Precisely the same reasoning is applicable to all other terms in -ideus, derived from compound adjectives in -īdes. It is egregious nonsense to say that the arytenoidean muscle is like a funnel; that the nerves or vessels supplying the prominence of the shoulder are like the Greek letter delta; or that the sterno-cleido-mastoidean muscle in the least resembles a nipple. But not so, that the first is connected with the Arytenoid cartilages; that the second are proper to the Deltoid muscle; or that the third belongs to the Mastoid process.

Section III.—Of terms from the Greek ending in -adæ, -idæ, and -ides.

These frequently occur among the distinctive titles of the Orders, Families, and Genera of natural history. They are freely employed by authors and instructors; but their status in language, precise meaning, pronunciation, or any certain guide for their correct employment, is nowhere indicated. They stand in the same predicament as those in -īdes (Div. i. *s.*i.). In endeavouring to obtain light from other minds on the subject generally of these observations, this particular branch was specially detailed with all the reasoning available, for and against the views to be now expressed, and the authoritative opinions which were in consequence elicited, supported my conclusion, that they are to be regarded as imitations of the Latin patronymic noun. While the assigning of this character forms a satisfactory arrangement of the difficulty that besets them, there are yet certain points with which it cannot easily be reconciled. Such, however, are probably attributable to the faulty construction of individual terms, rather than to the inapplicability of the patronymic character to them generally.

Patronymic nouns invariably signify pedigree from a person or people, or extraction from a city or country; but the terms in question do not comprise these conditions,—do not even apply to human beings, but to series of the lower animals, plants, metals, minerals, etc. Nevertheless, and howsoever the case may stand in classical language as to the limits to be observed in their formation, the expedient of adopting imitations of certain of them in the nomenclature of natural science, has, for convenience and by a pardonable license, been resorted to.

Terms in -adæ, -idæ, and -ides, are imitations of patronymic nouns, signifying groups connected with each other by some general relationship in appearance or habits; those ending in -ida may be held to be inaccurately put for such in -idæ.

Section IV.—Of terms from the Greek in -ōdēs.

This terminal is the analogue of -ώδης, denoting (in my apprehension) excess or fulness, as Αἱματώδης, having much, or full of blood. It is also analogous to the Latin -ōsus, corresponding to the English -ous, as fructus, fruit; fructuosus, abounding in fruit, or fructuous. I am aware that my assumption of there existing a distinction between epithets in -īdēs and in -ōdes is liable to be scouted by the pure Greek scholar as unfounded, the latter being held to be a mere contraction of the former in their Greek origin. However inclined to demur, space and circumstance alike forbid. My present purpose must be limited to showing that whatever be the classic relation of the epithets in question, their translation into Latin and English, and as employed in general, and especially in medical scientific Terminology, does indicate such a distinction which it is most convenient to recognise and maintain.

It is admitted that Greek adjectives in -ώδης are sometimes made to signify likeness to a certain object, and inserted as synonymous with those in -ειδής; but the former I conceive to be exceptional, as the result of a necessity when the particular term in -ώδης was most in use; the latter I imagine to have proceeded from inadvertency, for where both terms are given in the older Lexicons, as in Morell's Hedericus, the distinction between them is preserved. Although in Liddell and Scott's Lexicon they are represented to be synonymous, they are so with no slight inconsistency, thus, "Δαφνώδες, es,—δαφνοειδής, laurelled"; "Καλαμώδης, es, like a reed, full of reeds." In the just acceptation of language, that which is "laurelled" or (which is preferable) "full of reeds" or laurels will, in a certain sense, be like, because actually possessing or consisting of those very objects; but this is altogether apart from the idea of special resemblance, and nothing more, conveyed by the terms Δαφνοειδής and Καλαμοειδής. On the other hand, that which is like a laurel or a reed, need not have any affinity to or connexion with either, other than slight resemblance—in fact, may be a stone or a shell. How, then, can such be, with any propriety, supposed to be laurelled, or full of laurels or reeds?

Terms in -ōdes are to be held distinct from those in -īdes, and their grammatical character is that of adjectives of one termination, of the third declension, having "very rarely" the n. pl., and "seldom or never" the n. sing.

Section V.—Of Botanical terms ending in -ia, forming the titles of Classes and Orders in the Linn. and Juss. Systems.

Hitherto these have been characterised thus:—Monandria (a, ἀ, μόνος, alone; ἀνὴρ, a husband), the name of a Class in the sexual system of Linnæus, and Monogynia (μόνος and γυνὴ a woman) in a similar manner. These, and all of like formation, have no classical existence, but appear to have been invented for illustration of the peculiar arrangements of plants. One and all, from their meaning, application, termination, and from analogy, are to be regarded as adjectives of the first and second declensions. It is impossible to attach to them any distinct, and in itself complete, signification otherwise.

If Monandria and Monogynia were really nouns feminine, their signification, (to give the simplest, scarcely allowable, effect to their first constituent,) could only be one stamen or pistil, but this is an example of adjective and substantive in agreement. If, again, to bring them still nearer to the standard of a noun, the indefinite article be substituted for the numeral adjective, we indeed obtain a fair specimen, and say, a stamen,—a new compound word to signify this, however, was unnecessary, for it already formed the analogue of the Latin, stamen. Then, how were these terms to convey the idea of a Class and Order having but one stamen, one pistil in each flower? It would be absurd to say the Class Stamen, but not more so than the Class Monandria, if held to be a noun. Diandria and Digynia, Triandria and Trigynia, are more conspicuously illustrative of the point. They cannot be the names of things, but plainly express the quality of certain names of things. We might seem, indeed, to give a merely substantive meaning to them in this manner,—a tre-stamen (for triple stamen), as we say trefoil. Such a word, to be admissible at all, must be held to indicate a single object like the trefoil which, though it presents the semblance of three leaves, these proceed from one foliole; but it could not denote the class of things intended.

The titles under consideration are applied to genera, or kinds of plants which closely assimilate as to the number of stamens, or pistils in their flowers, respectively. They are nominatives plural of adjectives in ius, ia, ium; each has the quality, having or possessing, and agrees with genera (understood), pl. of Genus, a kind or species. Thus employed, they very aptly express the kinds with flowers having one, two, three, or a larger number of stamens or pistils. In corroboration of this, writers and lecturers on botany have recourse to English adjectives directly formed from them, as "Monandrious" or "Monogynious" plants. It cannot be said that these are nouns substantive; yet are they the literal analogues of the terms in question, and are very convenient for illustrating to the young and non-classically educated. Their translation, therefore, will be,—having or consisting of one, two (or more), stamens or pistils, as the case may be; or, more tersely, one-stamened, two-stamened, and so of the rest.

Section VI.—Of the Greek Aspirate, and the misplacement of its symbol, H, in Latin Compound Terms and their English Analogues.

In almost all (there are exceptions) terms from the Greek and their English analogues, in which the Spiritus asper, or rather its symbol the letter h, has been preserved, it is shifted from its original position, and put into another where it is superfluous and useless. It forms no part of my purpose to carp at a single instance of those friendly freedoms taken with h in certain districts of England. The following remarks refer solely to its misplacement in scientific nomenclature.

The examples in Latin and English are numerous, and occur in two forms, in the middle or at the end of a word, as Catarrhus, catarrh, Hæmorrhagia, hemorrhage; and at the beginning, as Rhachialgia, Rheumatismus, etc. The first example, Catarrhus, or common cold, is the Latin analogue of Κατάρροος, or, by contraction, Κατάρρους. To give more clearness and effect to the Spiritus asper, let the characters be strictly represented by italic types, and the symbol h be substituted for the aspirate, as is always done when the force of the latter is meant to be preserved, and they will assume this order, Katarhrous and not Katarrhous. The ordinary pronunciation of the former will be perfectly that of its original, but not so if the latter disposition of the h, which is that hitherto adopted, be given effect to. Surely the orthography of the etyma ought (as far as practicable) to be maintained in the derivative; for what end, then, has the h been transposed from its true situation before the second r to a place after it? Do not Catarhrus, catarhr, look as well, and sound as agreeably, as the common but false spelling Catarrhus, catarrh, while the former has the superior advantage of being etymologically correct? It may be said that the error is trivial, and we are so accustomed to it that it is needless to make an alteration. But it constitutes a discrepancy between the derivatives and their origin, an orthographical assertion, as it were, contrary to truth. It may be said, too, that the h being mute in the former, its position is unimportant. The aspirate, however, is not without effect in the originals or their roots; on the contrary, it forms a perceptible element in the sound of both in the example Hæmorrhagia,—αἷμα, haima; ῥήγνυμι, hregnumi. Therefore, its symbol ought not to be suppressed in the derivative; yet, if mute in the latter, as in its improper position it is, better cast it out altogether, (which in several similar terms has actually been done,) than maintain an error having no better origin than the carelessness or fancy of a transcriber.

The first example under the second form, or with h after initial R, is Rhachialgia. Here it is out of place and quite useless as to sound or sense, and, therefore, its entire dismissal would be preferable. Nor would this be without precedent, it having been thrown out in numerous instances of precisely similar origin with reference to the aspirate, as Rupia, from ῥύπος; Ruta, from ῥύομαι; Raphanus, from ῥάφανος; Racosis, from ῥάκος, etc. The second example, Rheumatismus, is subject to the same remarks. If of no value in Rupia, Ruta, Raphanus, and many others, why retain it in Rhachialgia, Rheumatismus, etc.? Such an inconsistency shows with how little regard to authority or adherence to uniformity the aspirate has been dealt with,—how accidentally and arbitrarily it has been misplaced. Some may be inclined to look with a smile of something between complacency and derision on the seriousness of my labours, particularly under this section, to establish a circumstance which they will regard as of no importance. I refer such to the general reasons briefly adverted to in the Introduction, and, in addition, offer one of a special kind, viz. that as in arranging the work now brought to a close, hundreds, if not thousands, of varied discrepancies exhibited themselves, a minute examination seemed called for. To me it can signify little whether they be thought worthy of removal or not; it was simply my duty to make them known.

It has been asked, "Why say that h should be before the r, when in the Greek characters it" (the Spiritus asper) "is over the letter, and all classical writers put the h after the r," a question which comprehends all of objection that can be advanced. The first part is the most important, but the statement on which it proceeds, that the aspirate is over the letter, evinces a misapprehension of a very trivial circumstance; while the latter portion, if strictly correct, would only corroborate my allegation of the prevalence of the error under consideration.

The Greek letter H was not originally employed as the capital of the long ε or η. It was drawn from the Hebrew radical ח, or Heth, and formerly was the mark of aspiration,—Οἶμαι δὲ καὶ διὰ τοῦ Η στοιχείου τυπῶσασθαι τοὺς παλαιοὺς τὴν δασεῖαν, διόπερ καὶ Ῥωμαῖοι πρὸ πάντων τῶν δασυνομένων ὀνομάτων τὸ ἡ προγράφουσι.* "I consider the ancients to have formed (expressed) aspiration by the letter H; wherefore, the Romans also wrote H before all aspirated words." In a similar manner, among the marks or signs of numbers anciently employed by the Greeks, H signified a hundred, because the first letter of the aspirated word now written ἑκατόν, hekaton. They then, for a period, actually wrote and carved on tablets and monuments the same word Ηεκατόν, thus placing the aspirate indisputably before the letter. They subsequently made use of H for ε long,—οὐ γὰρ ἡ ἐχρώμεθα ἀλλὰ ε̄ τὸ παλαιόν,† "for we did not formerly use ἡ, but ε̄."

Further, the Spiritus, both asper and lenis, now represented in this form, (῾) and (᾽), are but modifications of the equal halves of the letter H itself, divided lengthways. The Greeks, as has been shown, did not anciently place H (as the symbol of aspiration) above, but on and at the beginning of the line, word, or letter aspirated, and hence, it is said, much error arose from their having begun to employ the same letter H for long ε or η.‡ In consequence of which they for a time placed it above, and at length divided it into two, that by this means the first, or anterior part, might serve as the mark of aspiration (Spiritus asper), and the posterior, that of non aspiration (Spiritus lenis), in which manner they are still to be found employed in ancient writings. Again, on some very ancient coins of the Heracleenses, or people of Heraclea, there may be read ΗΡΑΚΛΕΩΝ and ΗΡΑΚΛΕΤΩΝ, the aspirate in this, its half modified state, being placed before the H, which was by that time made to signify the long ε or η of the context. Evidence to the same effect is afforded by another author,* whose exact words I translate:—"Its very origin, from the Hebrew ה, argues this power of aspirating to have been native and proper to it, which origin, I maintain, its name, rank, and figure unite to prove.....At first, therefore, η served to aspirate, being applied to vowels on the outside, but to the three mutes before stated, π, κ, τ, on the inside; but after it began to be reckoned a vowel two Spiritus were supplied from the larger H being divided, that is to say, the right half signified the lenis, the left the asper; for formerly the lenis was understood by the absence of the other."

* Athenæus, ix. § 57, p. 398 a. † Plato, Cratylus, § 91, p. 426 c.

With reference to the statement, that the aspirate is placed over the letter, it, no doubt, is so in what printers call "lower case letters;" its position in regard to capitals, however, is never over, but in many works is (improperly) after the letter, while in numbers of others it occupies its right place before it. What is the simple deduction? Just that it is placed over the lower-case letters for mere convenience, the aspirate and letter in each instance of their joint occurrence forming a single type; but in capitals this is impracticable, because the face of the letter occupies the entire end-surface of the type, leaving no room for introducing the Spiritus, either asper or lenis. The aspirate for such letters, therefore, has to be used as a separate type, its location is at the mercy of the compositor, who is not always a Greek scholar,—finds no very distinct direction in the manuscript, and has equal precedents for persevering in the error, or adopting what is correct. But even had the aspirate been over the capital as well as the lower-case letters, this would not have proved its proper situation to be after any more than before the letters. That not only all classical writers, but all of the scientific, philosophical, professional, and non-professional, learned and unlearned, that, in short, every one commits the error of putting the h after the r, instead of before it, constitutes the very grounds of my remarks: Hinc illæ lachrymæ.

Again, "Whether this aspiration ought to be put before or placed after, is deserving of inquiry. The latter has obtained by custom, as ῥέδα, rheda, etc.; but reason counsels the former, whence the Æolians have said βρόδον for ῥόδον, β being put in the place of the Spiritus (or, as Priscianus prefers, the digamma). Certainly, the more ancient of the barbarians (I allude to the Goths and Teutons) have placed h before l, n, and r." Both in the Scandinavian and Teutonic branches of the Gothic stock of languages we find, in the most early forms to which we have access, the almost constant employment of the h, before l, n, r, and w, or its cognate v. In Icelandic, which is the purest representative of the ancient Scandinavian language, we find the forms hl, hn, hr, and hv; while, in its descendants on the Continent, Swedish and Danish, we only find hv, where, however, the h is not sounded. Among the Teutonic languages, the Mœsogothic (which, in Bishop Ulphila's translation of the Gospels in the fourth century, is the earliest specimen we possess of any Gothic language) and the Anglo-Saxon, present us with the same combinations in abundance. With the exception of the Icelandic, all the now existing Gothic languages reject the h before l, n, and r, the Scandinavian branches preserve it before v; the German and Dutch dialects reject it, while the English and Scotch postpone it to w.

Of the three existing modes of disposing of the aspirate, h, before the r, as in Ahrizus, after it, as in Rhachitis, and thrown out altogether, as in Raphe, only one can be right; and, I submit, abundant reason has been shown for deciding in favour of the first of these. Where its symbol h ought to precede the initial R or r of Latin and English derivatives, it may well be dispensed with altogether, because to prefix it now would involve a change in alphabetical arrangement. Its retention, where it constitutes no part of sound nor mark of derivation, forms a departure from the orthography and orthöepy of their etyma. Its omission has already been made in many terms of precisely similar origin.

DIVISION II.

COMPRISING TERMS PECULIAR TO MEDICAL SCIENCE.

Section I.—Of the Pathological Term Anasarca.

In singling out a particular term as the subject of a section, I beg not to be misconceived. This or any other individual instance might, it is true, be quietly passed over, whether correct or not, without much detriment to science or its nomenclature. But, as a group, they are of considerable number; and it is hoped that the reasoning employed in the illustration, and for the improvement of each, will yield some light by which to be guided in rectifying such as may not be specially brought forward, or in constructing new terms.

"This medical term," says Kühn, "has hitherto been mistaken for a noun of the first declension, whereas it is really indeclinable;" and in support of this assertion adds, "that σάρκα is the accusative case of σὰρξ, and governed by the preposition ἀνὰ, which is joined only to that case." With all respect for such authority, I consider that the premises do not warrant the conclusion. The former are quite true, but cannot place a restriction on the formation of a Latin noun in the ordinary way. They prove nothing more than a mere coincidence,—the existence of similarity of spelling and sound between the accusative σάρκα and the latter portion of the Latin term -sarca, a circumstance which involves no necessity for declaring it to be indeclinable. The word has been in general use among professional men, and is one of the few medical terms to be found in Latin classical dictionaries, in all characterised as a noun of the first declension. It is simply compounded from two Greek words, to which that grammatical condition has been assigned for convenience in medical language, but without reference to ἀνὰ being a preposition, or the fact that the Greek rule joins it only to an accusative, that case of σὰρξ being σάρκα.

The construction of a Latin compound term should not be cramped by the rule of a different language. As well might it be said that "Moxa" has been "mistaken" for a noun of the first declension, because it is a Japanese word, or Myrrha, because a Hebrew one, each unvarying in the language it belongs to, and that, therefore, both are indeclinable. The alteration is not required; the opinion on which it is grounded is unsound. Anasarca is properly characterised as a noun of the first declension.

Section. II—Of the Anatomical Term Gastrocnemius.

This word is represented as a noun masculine, from γαστὴρ, the belly, and κνήμη, the leg. "Two, or according to some anatomists, four, muscles form the fleshy part, or calf of the leg. These muscles are called gastrocnemii."* Such, however, is neither the grammatical rank, nor the direct derivation of the term. Classical and medical authorities† present two terms, synonymous with each other, and similar in construction to this,—Gastrocnemia and Gastrocnemion, the analogues of Γαστροκνημία and Γαστροκνήμιον. Both signify the calf of the leg, but nowhere is this supposed noun, or its Greek prototype, to be found. One of the older anatomists, indeed, has used the expression Musculi gastrocnemii,‡ and, so, given rise, perhaps, to the idea, as if the latter were the nom. pl. of a noun Gastrocnemius. It cannot be so characterised, however, nor can its translation be, as seems to have been supposed, the muscles—the Gastrocnemii, for no such noun exists, and no such nom. pl. can come from Gastrocnemia or Gastrocnemion. The expression might well be translated, the muscles of the calf of the leg, taking Gastrocnemii as the genitive sing. of Gastrocnemion; but in that case Gastrocnemius could only be viewed as a superfluous synonyme of the other two. But to form an adjective of this termination on the model of those two classical synonymes to signify pertaining, belonging to, or connected with, the calf of the leg, was quite consistent with established precedent. Agreeably to this view, the expression would now be perfectly intelligible as the concord of adjective with substantive, signifying the muscles belonging to or forming the calf of the leg, and its reasonableness will be rendered more conspicuous by adopting into the English the common expedient of an analogue,—gastrocnemian. Such an expedient is both allowable and highly serviceable, this adjective in Latin and English being applicable not only to the two or the four muscles, but to every other part entering into the formation of the calf of the leg, to the skin, cellular tissue, fascia, vessels, and nerves composing, supplying, or traversing its region, and to the region itself.

Gastrocnemius bears the same relation to Gastrocnemion, as Arytænoideus (musculus) to Arytænoides (cartilagines). See Div. i. s. ii. Like numerous other adjectives which are by habit applied to muscles as names, though in reality only epithets indicative of their form or situation, it has at the same time a general application. The same muscle or muscles to which it is applied is, or are correspondingly distinguished by the epithet Gemellus (musc.), or the double muscle.

Section III.—Of the Anatomical Term Psalloides.

This word in -ides falls, of course, under the remarks contained in Div. i. s. i.; but it is brought forward in this place for reasons different from that of its terminal syllable, or adjective character. It is familiarly known in the distinctive epithet Corpus psalloides, given to the triangular, medullary space between the posterior crura of the Fornix cerebri, because its inferior surface is marked with prominent medullary fibres, which have suggested the likeness to a stringed musical instrument. The following definition is usually given:—"Psalloides (from ψαλλος, a stringed instrument, and ειδος, a likeness). An appearance on the under-surface of the fornix of the brain is called Corpus psalloides."§ No such term is to be found in the older classical or medical lexicons, nor have I been able to trace such a word as ψαλλος, here put as its etymon. Instead, however, appears Psaloides,‖ the analogue of ψαλοειδὴς for ψαλιδοειδὴς, signifying, arched like a vault, and applied to a hard body borne or raised on three arches, forming the roof of the third or middle ventricle of the brain, from ψαλὶς, an arched work, arch or vault. There is a name for the object to which the epithet Psalloides has been applied, viz., Lyra, to which no objection can be offered.

It is evident that Psalloides is in itself erroneous, probably a corruption of Psaloides,—that, even if it were a correct term, it is falsely applied in the expression Corpus psalloides, for this, or rather Corpus psaloides, does not denote the "appearance on the under-surface of the fornix," but the fornix itself. That appearance of cords or lines on the under-surface posteriorly of the latter, is fitly named Lyra, which cannot be a synonyme of the Corpus psaloides, this signifying, an arched or arch-like body, as already stated—the Fornix.

Section IV.—Of the Pathological Terms Emprosthotonos, Opisthotonos, Pleurothotonos.

These three terms have been hitherto presented as nouns masculine, the names of particular forms of spasmodic affection of the muscles. Emprosthotonos is the analogue of the adjective ἐμπροσθότονος, from ἔμπροσθεν, before, τείνω, to bend, bent or stretched forwards. Opisthotonos is similar, from ὄπισθεν, behind, and τείνω, bent backwards. Pleurothotonos is of modern construction in imitation of the other two, from πλευρόθεν, from the side, and τείνω. All three fall under the same general character. With respect to the first two, their masculine is sometimes used substantively (σπασμὸς being understood), and synonymously with ἐμπροσθοτονία and ὀπισθοτονία, or a convulsion of parts forwards and backwards. In Pathology they are the names of diseases, "that form of tetanus in which the body is bent forwards" or "backwards." In themselves, however, the words bear no allusion to tetanus or any other disease, but have a general signification of bending forwards or backwards. And although in medical parlance they are each made to characterise by an adjective quality, one form of tetanus as distinguished from others, still the meaning and application are general, and by no means limited to a form of this or any other affection.

In Nosological descriptions, these three terms characterise certain varieties of tetanus, or spasmodic disease of the muscles; and it is worthy of remark that another variety, which it has been thought unnecessary to specify, is termed Completus, or complete tetanus. This trivial circumstance goes far to establish the true status of the others under consideration, and throws light upon what, with the same necessity for distinctive appellation, was originally intended by the adoption of terms similar to completus in quality and purpose. While it is admitted that the originals of the first two being stated to be used substantively, gives authority for their like use in Latin and English (a use, indeed, which, by the idiom of both, would have been made of them all without such authority), it presents no ground whatever for converting them into nouns substantive. As in the Greek, the first two are indubitably adjectives; and the third, formed in imitation of those, is the same, and each, like Completus, is employed to distinguish a variety of Tetanus, agreeing with it as adjective and substantive.

Section V.—Of the Anatomical Term Platysma-myoides.

This term, applied to the broad muscle of the neck, occupies a false position with reference to its orthography, derivation, and, consequently, the precise meaning attached to it. It is given thus, "Platysma-myoides (from πλατυς, broad, μυς, a muscle, and ειδος, resemblance), a thin muscle on the side of the neck and immediately under the skin", etc.* No definition of the term itself is attempted, nor any further explanation of its etymology offered, nothing but this abrupt notice of its application; the signification left to be inferred being,—resembling a broad muscle, or, it might be, broad like a muscle. These do not convey the real meaning. The object to which it is applied is not only like, but actually constitutes a broad muscle, which for this very reason is otherwise called by Albinus and Douglas, Latissimus (musculus) colli. By more closely examining the constituents of this compound epithet, its true signification will be best ascertained.

Platysma may be easily disposed of. It does not come directly "from πλατὺς, broad," although that is the root of the etymon from which it is immediately derived, viz., πλατύνω, to render full and spacious, or to dilate. It is the analogue of πλάτυσμα, which signifies, a broad sheet of linen, or of anything similar, on which a plaster is spread; also, generally that which is extended breadthwise; a dilatation or expansion. Thus, a lamina, or plate of iron, has been called πλάτυσμα σιδήρου.† The words πλατὺς μῦς, which form two of the items of its assigned derivation, are not its etyma, but a definition‡ of the epithet itself, simply signifying the broad muscle.

-Myoides is to be ranked with terms in -ides (see Div. i. s. i). It forms in itself a useful epithet, resembling muscle or flesh, but it is incorrectly employed in Platysma-myoides. It is there confounded with another term much like it, but different in its nature. The proper word is Myodes (see Div. i. s. iv.), the analogue of μυώδης, signifying, pertaining to, having or full of muscle or flesh, fleshy. It is simply a derivative of μῦς itself. It is submitted, therefore, that in Platysma-myoides, its assigned etymology and the explanation implied are mistaken, confused, and defective; in that proposed to be restored (for it is the true and original term according to several authorities§), viz., Platysma-myodes, all is clear, and gives a just idea of the object,—the thin, broad, subcutaneous muscle,—or, by literal translation, the musculous or fleshy expansion of the neck.

Section VI.—Of the Terms—1. Acidum, Causticum, etc. 2. Ephemera. 3. Narcotics, Antispasmodics, Tonics, etc. 4. Fibrine, Stearine, Salicine, etc. 5. Of the Latin Diphthongs æ and œ, and their English Translation. 6. Of the Terminal -icus. 7. Of the Terminal -ismus. 8. Of the Terminal -igo. 9. Of the Term Lambdoidalis, etc. 10. Zygoma.

1. The words Acidum, Causticum, and others like them, have been presented as nouns neuter, "an acid," "a caustic," etc. No such nouns existed previously to such notification, and, while freedom is ceded as to their employment substantively in speech or writing, it is worse than useless to create pseudo-nouns only to please a mistaken fancy; in their proper form as adjectives they serve every purpose. They, severally, are the neuter of an adjective (requiring corpus or *liquidum to be understood). No doubt they are often employed alone, as we say and write an acid, a caustic, the lunar caustic, but only idiomatically; for though perfectly familiarized to this use of them, let it be asked, Acid what? or, Caustic what? and we at once perceive their incompleteness, and the blunder of characterising them as nouns.

* Hooper. † Aëtius, l. ix. c. 48, in Greek MS., as quoted by Gorræus. ‡ Gorræus.
§ Scapula, Gorræus, Castellus, Hedericus, etc. ‖ Hooper.

2. Ephemera forms another instance of the loose manner in which medical terminology has been constructed, being given as a noun of the first declension, "a fever of a day's duration." It is the nom. sing. fem. of the adjective Ephemerus. Ephemera, carries no indication of fever, but, signifying "pertaining to a day," is applied (febris understood) to a fever, the exacerbation of which recurs every twenty-four hours; while the same spelling, but the nom. pl. n., is applied to the genera, or kinds of insects that live but one day.

3. The titles, Narcotics, Antispasmodics, Tonics, etc., given to certain groups of medicines according to their qualities, are without distinct grammatical status. The only one characterised at all is represented as Cholagogus, i, m., from χολὴ, bile, and ἄγω, to drive away.† Some are explained as "applied adjectively and substantively," while another, Escharotic, is declared to be "a substance which," etc. Such imperfect information creates confusion, especially in the mind of the young student; they all imply, as proper to them, the general character of nouns, but erroneously so; they, and every other of similar application, being adjectives or participles, agreeing with haustus, potio, medicamentum, or some similar noun, understood in the singular or plural.

4. Fibrine, Stearine, Salicine, etc., the names of certain chemical principles discovered in animal, vegetable, and mineral substances, are spelled in two modes, according to whim or caprice, as fibrin and fibrine, lignin and lignine. The difference is slight, yet sufficient to render its removal desirable. It would be difficult to decide by special rule which is the best, but at least we ought not to have both. The final e is superfluous as to sound: we do not properly say, fibr*ine* or lign*ine*, giving the last syllable as in the English numeral nine, but pronounce according to the true Latin sound of the letter i, as if fibr*een* and lign*een*, etc., adopting, in fact, the Latin words themselves, short only of their terminating letter.‡ It is superfluous, also, as to their sense or status. But, by maintaining it in these words, a confusion is created between some of them used as names of chemical principles and likewise as adjectives; for example, Crystalline is the name of one of the products of Indigo, and it is at the same time an adjective expressing relation to, having the nature of a crystal. This confusion will be avoided by discarding the final e from the former, and every word like it,—crystallin,—and by letting it remain in the latter.

5. There is no uniformity, no settled understanding as to the manner of rendering into English orthography those Greek derived Latin terms in which the diphthongs æ and œ occur. The former of these is by many adopted into the English, as Hæmorrhage, Hæmaphein, while many change it into e, as Hemorrhage, Hemaphein, etc. The latter is to be preferred; it is more simple, more English, and there is abundant precedent for holding it to be more correct,—Spherical, from Sphæricus, Demon, from Dæmon, Equal, from Æqualis, etc. The diphthong œ, which is frequently employed in English, as in fœtus, fœtal, fœtor, fœtid, and sometimes changed into e, as fetus, fetal, fetor, fetid, falls under the same remark, and for like reasons the substitution of the e in the English seems preferable: nor is authority wanting for this mutation, as Economy from Œconomia, Penal, from Pœna, etc. A difficulty presents itself as to the English analogues of Latin terms ending in -œa, as Gonorrhœa, Otorrhœa, etc.; but these are adopted as they stand, not translated into English, and the rule should be, in writing or printing, to underline, or render in italic type, as significant of their Latin form.

6. The terminal -icus, the equivalent of -ικὸς, is of very frequent use for the forming of compound adjectives from existing nouns, to which it is added for that purpose. It conveys to them simply the quality of relation to that which the noun signifies.

7. The addition of the terminal -ismus, analogue of -ισμὸς, to form a compound noun m., confers upon it the sense of existence or condition, exercise or practice, of that signified by the etymon to which it is added, as Iodismus (Iodinium and -ismus), the existence of effects, or the condition produced by the use of iodine, Albinismus, the condition of the Albino, Catheterismus (Catheter, -ismus), the practice of using, or the introduction of the catheter.

8. The terminal -igo, from ago, to do or act, denotes in its general and obvious sense, the act or state implied in the word to which it is joined. It seems, however, in my apprehension, to have had a more particular meaning, viz., over-action, as if the various morbid conditions indicated by the names into which it enters, were caused by repletion of the system, the result of this over-action or excessive indulgence in whatever is calculated to produce it. The opinion may be a mistaken one, but all the compound names referred to are consistent with its import.

* Liquidum, apparently inconsistent with the above remarks, is really recognised as a noun, signifying water, moisture, or liquid:—Gouldman, Littleton, Ainsworth, etc.

† Hooper.

‡ The Latin i, it may be necessary to state, receives the sound here expressed on the Continent, and wherever that language, pure or mixed, is spoken or taught, and not that given to it in England: for example, virus is pronounced veerus, not vyrus. It has been and generally is so taught throughout Scotland.

9. Lambdoīdālis, usually applied to the suture of the parietal and occipital bones of the cranium, is an example of erroneous employment of a term of this form for one in -īdes. There are many words of like formation, some of which may be very rightly used in particular circumstances; whereas, others are, as this is, improperly made to supplant their originals in -ides. In this respect they are in much the same condition as the terms in -ideus (Div. i. s. ii.), to which they form a superfluous addition. Lambdoidalis, if allowed to be correct in itself, can only be viewed as the derivative, not directly of λ and εἶδος, but of Lambdoides, and held to mean, not resembling the letter λ, as this etymon does, but pertaining to Lambdoides (sutura), the lambdoid (suture), or any other object to which the prototype may be applied. It is, therefore, falsely employed in connexion with the suture of the cranium referred to. Of similar compounds, that are correctly employed, are Ethmoidalis (sutura) and (Sphenoidalis (sutura), and it will be well to examine into the reasons why terms so closely alike in termination and (apparently) application, are quite right in one case, and positively wrong in the other.

Lambdoides is aptly designative of the occipito-parietal suture, accurately denoting the course it takes; Lambdoidalis cannot mean the same resemblance to λ, but, belonging to that which does so resemble. Ethmoides, or sieve-like, cannot well be applied to a suture formed by the ethmoid with other bones, because the suture has no likeness to a sieve; Ethmoidalis, however, is appropriately used for that purpose, because it expresses, belonging to the Ethmoides os, or sieve-like bone. In the first, the suture is lambdoid or like λ; and certain attachments of the pericranium to the irregular points or interstices of the suture may be called lambdoidal, or connected with the lambdoid suture. In the second the suture is not ethmoid, or sieve-like, but is ethmoidal, or connected with the ethmoid, or sieve-like bone.

10. The anatomical term Zygoma has been represented to be "from ζυγὸς, a yoke; (because it transmits the tendon of the temporal muscle like a yoke.) The cavity under the Zygomatic process of the temporal bone and os malæ."* Zygoma is but another name for the Os jugale, Os malæ, or cheek-bone, and is so-called from ζυγὸς, a yoke, because the peculiar formation of its chief process is joined to the corresponding portion of the temporal bone, the two forming something like the yoke by which oxen were joined together in drawing the plough, etc. The cavity, and the process of each bone, are called Zygomatic, simply because pertaining to the Zygoma.

CONCLUSION.

Those inaccuracies and errors that are not noticed here, many of which will be found to exist, are either self-evident, or of minor importance, and the observations already made, may be easily extended to them, while their precise nature and any additional peculiarities which they may exhibit will be carefully noted and explained in their proper places in the Lexicon. In giving publicity to the foregoing somewhat revolutionary opinions, I had but one object in view; to submit them to the test of abler minds for approval, or condemnation. Whatsoever of blindness, misconception, or dogmatism, they may be chargeable with, my aim at improvement will, I trust, entitle me to indulgence. The unhappy propensity, in some, to make new words on trifling occasion, and, often, out of very raw materials; and the blundering aptitude, in others, for misusing those already in existence, have done much to bring the terminology of medicine more especially into contempt, and so have rendered the present attempt not uncalled for. Finally, while I should be gratified by corroboration of my views, I shall feel no less grateful for any distinct grounds of their refutation.

LEEDS SCHOOL OF MEDICINE

EXPOSITORY LEXICON,

ETC., ETC.

A. (The Greek α, or alpha.) This letter, much used as a prefix in compound words, has a negative, or privative force, similar to the English in, ir, etc.: as, Tonic, possessing tone or strength; Atonic, without, or having diminished tone or strength.

'A Deux Temps. (Fr.) Surg. At two times; the operation à deux temps means that of Lithotomy, in which the calculus, from being encysted, sacculated, or embedded, from contraction of the bladder, or the like cause, cannot be immediately extracted, and is therefore let alone for the time, in the hope that, after some days, during the suppurating stage, it will have become disengaged, and extraction may then be effected.

AA. Med. These two letters, written in prescriptions after the names of two or more medicines, are an abbreviation of the Greek word ἀνὰ, and indicate that the quantity marked is to be taken of each of the substances mentioned in connexion with them. Fr. syn. āā,—de chaque. Germ. syn. ana,—von jedem.

AAA. Chem. These three letters stand for a contraction of Amalgama, an amalgam. See Amalgam.

Aabam. (Arab.) Chem. An alchemical name for plumbum, or lead. Ruland.

Abac'tus Venter. M. Jur., Obstet. An old term for abortion induced by art, according to Chambers and James. Literally it means an expelled (emptied) belly. See Abortion.

Abăcus, i, m. (Ἄβαξ, , ἄβακος, a mathematical table on which lines and figures were drawn.) Med. Old name for a table used for preparations.

Abaisir. Chem. See Spodium Abaisir.

Abal'ienated. (See Abalienation.) Med., Pathol. Applied to a part so destroyed as to require its extirpation, according to Scribonius Largus, compos. 227; also, to the decay of the internal and external senses, according to same author, 180; also, used by Celsus, simply, for corrupted, v. 26; vii. 16.; viii. 10; alienated. Abāliēnātus, a, um.

Abaliena'tion. (Ab, from; aliēno, to estrange.) Med., Pathol. A term formerly used for decay either of the whole or part of the body; also for the loss or failing of the senses, or of the mental faculties, according to Scribonius Largus. Abāliēnātio, ōnis, f. See Abalienated.

Abanet. (Heb. Abanet, the girdle worn by the Jewish priests.) Med., Surg. Old term for a bandage. Turton.

Abanga. Bot. Name given by the natives to a tree of the island of St. Thomas, otherwise called Ady.

Abaptis'ton. (Ἀβάπτιστον the trepan, but originally the neuter of the adjective ἀβάπτιστος, from ἀ, neg.; βαπτίζω, to plunge, or dip; as if it could not be immersed.) Surg. Term applied, Gr. anal. Ἀβάπτιστον τρύπανον, (or ἀβάπτιστος τρυπάνη. Gorræus.) by Galen and others to the crown of the old trepan, which was coniform, or had some contrivance to prevent it from penetrating the cranium too suddenly, and so injuring the brain. Trepans which had a ring or knob a little above their point, as a similar protection, were, according to Paulus Ægineta, Adam's Transl. v. ii. p 435, called Abaptista. Abaptistum, i. n. Fr. anal. abaptista, or abaptiston, n. Germ. syn. eine Trephine; ein Trepan, mit koniscber krone.

Abaremo-temo. Bot., Pharm. Name for a tree growing in the Brazilian mountains, supposed to be a Mimosa; the decoction of its bark is applied, as astringent, to ill-conditioned ulcers.

Abarnahas. (Arab.) Alchemical term used in the business of the transmutation of metals, signifying the full moon, or Magnesia.

Abartamen. (Arab.) Chem. Old term for the metal plumbum, or lead. Ruland.

Abarticula'tion. (Ab, incret.; artĭcŭlātio, a joint.) Anat. Term, Gr. syn. Ἀπάρθρωσις, used by Galen, Com. ii. in Hipp. de artic. t. 8.; by Foësius, in Œcon. Hippocr. p. 69, etc. for a kind of articulation admitting of free motion. Abartĭcŭlātio, ōnis, f. See Aparthrosis, Coarticulation, Diarthrosis.

Ab'as. (Supposed Arab.) Pathol. Old name for the disease Porrigo favosa, or scaldhead, as stated by P. Sorbait, Medic. pract. tract. vi. c. 14, in princip. p. 757. Zoöl. The Tænia, or tape-worm, according to Turton.

Abbrevia'tion. (Abbrĕvio, to make short, or to abridge.) The act or process of shortening; also, that which is shortened. In language, a part of a word or term which is thus shortened by cutting off one or more of its latter syllables. Med., Pharm. Applied incorrectly to certain marks or signs employed in formulæ and prescriptions. See Sign. Also applied to many initial letters, and contractions of words, which will be found in their alphabetical order. Abbrĕviātio, ōnis, f. Fr. anal. abrèviation, f.

Abbrĕviātus, a, um. (Abbrĕvio, to make short, or to abridge.) Bot. Shortened, as when the cup is shorter than the tube of the flower: abbrev'iate; abbrev'iated. Fr. syn. abrégé, adj.

Abcdāria Her'ba. Bot. A name given to the plant Spilanthus acmella, because the Ethiopians gave it to their children to chew, believing it enabled them to pronounce their letters better; also spelt Abecedaria.

Abdelavi. (Arab.) Bot. Name for a kind of melon plant, growing in Egypt, the fruit of which is of an insipid taste, but the seeds are reputed as refrigerant.

Abdōmen, ĭnis, n. (Abdo, to hide; because the abdominal viscera are hidden within its cavity.) Anat. Name for the largest cavity of the human body; the belly or abdomen. Comp. Anat. Applied to the same region in the lower animals. Also termed Venter. See Imus Venter, Mirach, Nadys, Sumen. Fr. anal. abdomen, m.; syn. bas-ventre, m. Germ. syn. Bauch, m.; Schmeerbauch, m.; Unterbauch, m.; Unterleib, m.

NOTE.—In some dictionaries, omentum is added as a part of the derivation, to account for the last syllable of this word. The suggestion originated with Martinius, it is supposed, but was long ago shewn to be erroneous, that syllable being merely a termination of frequent use in the Latin, as acumen, from acuo; foramen, from foro, etc.

Abdom'inal. (Abdōmen, the belly.) Anat. Of, or belonging to, or in some manner connected with the abdomen or belly; ventral. Abdōmĭnālis, is, e. Fr. anal. abdominal, adj. Germ. syn. zum Schmeerbauche gehörig.

Abdom'inal Aor'ta. Anat. Term for that portion of the aorta situated below the diaphragm. Fr. anal. aorte abdominale. Germ. syn. Unterleibes-Aorta.

Abdom'inal Aponeuro'sis. Anat. Term for the conjoined tendons of the oblique and transverse muscles on the anterior portion of the abdomen or belly. Fr. anal. aponévrose abdominale. Germ. syn. Unterleibes-Flechsenhaut.

Apothecarius, ii, m. See Apothecary.

Apo'thecary. (Ἀποθήκη, a repository, shop, or store.) Med. The word Apotheca was first received, it is believed, into the medical language of the continent, as indicating a shop, warehouse, or cellar where medicines, simple and compound, were prepared and kept for sale, from whence the possessors of these shops came to be called Apothecarii; although previously the name Apotheca signified a wine-cellar. Its original signification was simply a store, magazine, or warehouse of any kind, and the proprietors of such were styled Apothecarii, without particular reference to the Pigmentarii (sellers of paints), Seplasiarii (sellers of powders and ointments), Pharmacopolæ (quacks, or mountebanks), or the Medicamentarii (sellers of medicines), of the Romans; all of which occupations in many instances are thriftily combined into one by the English chemist and druggist, and, in some, by the veritable Apothecary of the present day. The term, however, by act of parliament, 55 Geo. iii. c. 194, s. 5, specially belongs to certain compounders of medicines whether prescribed by themselves, or by any physician licensed by the Faculty of Physic in London, or by either of the two Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, whose prescriptions they are bound to prepare when required, under a penalty of 5*l.* for the first offence; 10*l.* for the second, and forfeiture of their certificates, and incapability in future of exercising the art and mystery of an apothecary: and thus is preserved one marked feature of the apothecary, or mere mixer of drugs, of the past. After serving an apprenticeship of five years to one of their body, attending various enjoined classes for instruction, and undergoing examination as to their fitness, they are licensed by the Worshipful Apothecaries Company, not only to compound medicines, but to practise all the branches of the medical art. Apŏthēcārius, ii, m. Bofarei'ra. Bot., M. Med. Name, in the language of the Cape de Verd Islands, for the Ricinus communis (the white species, so called to distinguish it from another, the red species, which appears to be only a variety of the white), used there, according to Dr. J. O. M'William, as galactagogue, not only to accelerate and increase the milk in the breasts of child-bearing women, but to produce milk in the breasts of women who are not child-bearing, or who even have not given birth to, or suckled a child for many years. A decoction is made by boiling a handful of the leaves in six or eight pints of spring water, and bathing the breasts for fifteen or twenty minutes; then part of the boiled leaves are thinly spread on the breasts, and allowed to remain till all moisture has been removed by evaporation and probably by absorption in some degree. This operation is repeated at short intervals, till milk flows on suction by the child. The leaves of the red species similarly employed, are said to be powerfully irritant and emmenagogue, producing an immediate, and often immoderate, flow of the menses. These varieties are called Ricinus communis major (or red) and minor (or white). See Jatropha Curcas.

Călor, ōris, m. (Căleo, to be hot.) Physiol. Heat: warmness. Fr. syn. chaleur, f. Germ. syn. Wärme, f.

Călor Anĭmālis. Physiol. Animal heat, which in man raises the mercury of Fahrenheit's thermometer to about 95°, and the principal, or at least an evident source of which is in the respiration, appearing to proceed from the formation of carbonic acid, whether it takes place directly in the lungs, in the arteries, or in the parenchyma of the organs. It has been ascertained, that the heat of the blood increases nearly a degree in traversing the lungs, and being thence distributed to all parts of the body, animal heat is thus carried everywhere into the several organs. But the respiration is only one among the sources of animal heat, and amidst conflicting opinions there seems to be only one point established, "that the evolution of heat is a vital act, depending immediately on the process of nutrition, the conditional and preservative cause of life. The taking of aliments, and their assimilation by digestion and respiration; the circulation of the fluids, nutrition, and secretion; the renewal of materials that accompanies the exercise of life, and the incessant changes of composition in the solids and fluids, all of which in animals are under the influence of the nerves, also bear their part in the generation of heat, and it is erroneous to seek the source of it in any one of those causes alone." See Aleos, Emphyton, Lar, Thermasia, Thermon.

Călor Mor'dĭcans. Pathol. Old term for the almost burning heat of the skin in ardent fevers, which causes an unpleasant sensation on the fingers after touching the patient; so at least is said, and hence this phrase, a biting heat. Hooper.

Calor'ic. (Călor, heat.) Chem. Term for the matter, or cause of the sensation of heat; igneous fluid. Călōrĭcum, i, n. Fr. anal. calorique, m. Germ. syn. Wärmematerie, f.; Wärmestoff, m.

Calor'ic, Ab'solute. Chem. Term for the total amount of heat in bodies; also called absolute heat. Fr. anal. calorique absolu.

Calor'ic, Combined, Insen'sible, or La'tent. Chem. Term for that which existing in a substance, cannot be perceived to differ in quantity from that of the substances around it. Fr. anal. calorique combiné, or latent.

Calor'ic, Free, or Sen'sible. Chem. Term for that which quits the substance in which it existed, and combines with other substances; so termed so long as it remains thus; also called free or sensible heat. Fr. anal. calorique libre.

Calor'ic, Ra'diant. Chem. A term for that which is communicated by the sun, or a fire, and moves with the same velocity as light through the air, viz. 192,000 miles per second. Fr. anal. calorique rayonnant.

Calor'ic, Speci'fic. Chem. A term applied to the comparative quantity of heat peculiar to each substance which is required to produce a given elevation of temperature. Fr. anal. calorique spécifique.

Calori'city. (Călor, heat.) Physiol. Term for that faculty which organs possess of preparing a quantity of heat necessary to life, and of maintaining the temperature of the body in all situations, whether hot, or cold. Călōrĭcĭtas, ātis, f. Fr. anal. caloricité, f.

Calori'fic. } (Călor, heat; fio, to become; ter-Calori'fient. } minal -ĭcus.) Physiol. Heat-producing; heat-creating. Călōrĭfĭcus, a, um. Călōrĭficns, tis, part. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 6. Fr. anal. calorifique, adj. Germ. syn. erhitzend, part. adj.

Calori'meter. (Călor, heat; μέτρον, a measure.) Chem. Name for an instrument by which to ascertain the quantity of caloric disengaged from any substance. Călōrĭ'mĕtrum, i, n. Fr. anal. calorimètre, m. Germ. syn. Wärmemesser, n.

Cal'tha, æ, f. A Linn. genus of plants, Cl. Polyandria; Ord. Polygynia. Juss. Corymbiferæ. The marigold. Fr. syn. souci, m. Germ. syn. Ringelblume, f.

Cal'tha Arven'sis. Bot. The systematic name of the wild marigold, the juice of which has been given in jaundice, and depraved state of the system; the leaves have been given as a salad to scrofulous children; also called Caltha vulgaris. See Calendula arvensis. Fr. syn. le souci des jardins. Germ. syn. die Feld-Ringelblume.

NOTE.—This word has been characterised in another work as Carbon, onis, n., and, supposing it to be a correct term, the question whether the penult syllable of its genitive, and the corresponding one in its derivatives, should be long or short is attended with some difficulty, there being apparently fair grounds for each view. Dr. Pereira adopts the Latin analogue here given, a legitimate expedient which goes far to remove difficulty, and, of course, makes that syllable in Carbonis and all its derivatives long.

NOTE.—It is remarkable that this and almost all Latin words and their English analogues, in which the Greek aspirate, or its symbol the letter h, is preserved, are everywhere incorrectly spelled by the misplacement of that letter. This manifest error is traceable to the earliest period at which we find Greek words commencing with ῥ introduced into the Latin language, and has been so constantly maintained, that for the present, at least, I content myself with merely pointing it out, suppressing my own convictions only in deference to universal custom. Yet there appears no good reason for its perpetuation, as Catarhrus, catarhr, look and sound quite as well as the customary but false spelling Catarrhus, catarrh, while the former have the advantage of consistency with their origin, and of being, what the latter are not, etymologically correct. So of all words in which the aspirate is retained.

Cata'rrhal. (Cătarrhus, catarrh.) Pathol. Of or belonging to, or of the nature of catarrh; applied to a fever accompanying catarrh, etc. Cătarrhā'lis, is, e. See Diss. div. i. s. vi. Fr. anal. catarrhal, adj. Germ. syn. Catarrhalisch, adj.

Cell. Anat. A cavity or hollow place. Cella, æ, f. Bot. Term for the space between the valves and partitions of a capsule. Lŏcŭlāmentum, i, n. Pathol. Term for a body in morbid growths, composed of an external wall or vesicle, enclosing various kinds of contents, often granular ones; at other times consisting of one or more internal vesicles, which are then called nuclei, containing granules or nucleoli; also termed a corpus'cle. Physiol. A minute cell as the origin or commencement of every plant and animal; and that force which is common to both is the power of forming cells: a cel'lule. In the vegetable cell there is the power of causing the organic substance in the phycomater to assume the form of cells; and in the animal cell, the ready combined elements in the blood are made to take a similar form, and this form is the simplest idea that can be conceived of life; in the lowest instances, a simple cell-forming force. Cella, æ, f. Cellŭla, æ, f. Fr. syn. cellule, f. Germ. anal. Zelle, f.

Cell-Nu'cleus. Physiol. Another name for the cytoblast; also termed areola.

Cell-The'ory. Physiol. Term for the developement of the proposition that there exists one general principle for the formation of all organic productions, and that this principle is the formation of cells, as well as the conclusions which may be drawn from this proposition. In a more limited sense, it means whatever may be inferred from this proposition with respect to the powers from which these phenomena result.

Cell-Wall. Bot., Physiol. Name given to the external layer of the vegetable cell.

Cel'lŭla, æ, f. (Dim. Cella, a cell.) Anat., Bot., Physiol. A little cell, cavity, or hollow place: a cel'lule. Fr. anal. cellule, f. Germ. anal. Zelle, f.

Cel'lular. (Cellŭla, a little cell.) Anat., Bot. Having, or consisting of cells, or cavities. Cellŭlāris, is, e. Fr. anal. cellulaire, adj. Germ. syn. zellgewebartig, adj.; zellict, adj.

Cel'lular Mem'brane. } Anat. See Membrana, Cel'lular Tex'ture. } Texture, and Tissue.
Cel'lular Tis'sue. } Bot. Cellular tissue is a peculiar arrangement of a fine membrane of which the solid part of vegetables, when minutely scrutinized, is found to consist. It is formed of very small cells, or vesicles, globular as in the leaves, elongated as in the wood and bark, or hexagonal as in the medulla, or pith. Fr. anal. tissu cellulaire. Germ. syn. Zellgewebe, f.

Cellŭlāris, is, e. (Cellŭla, a little cell.) Of or belonging to a little cell: cel'lular. Zoöl. Applied to a Family (Cellulares, nom. pl. m.) and to a genus (Cellularia, nom. pl. n.) of that Family of the Polypi coralliferi, in which each polypus is adherent in a corneous, or calcareous cell.

Cellule. See Cellula.

Cel'lulose. (Cellŭla, a little cell; because young vegetable cells consist most frequently of this substance alone.) Chem. Term for a substance obtained by analysis from woods, fruits, and all vegetable matters constituting the cellular substance of plants.

Celo'tomy. (Κήλη, a tumour, also hernia; τέμνω, to cut.) Surg. A term for the operation of removing the stricture in strangulated hernia by cutting. Cēlŏtŏmia, æ, f. Fr. anal. célotomie, f. Germ. syn. Bruchschnitt, m.

Cel'sa. An old fanciful term for what was called "Musculus vitæ," or a pulse or beating wandering through every part of the body, according to Ruland. Paracelsus intended by this, a flatus or vapour, or certain spurious and wild spirit lurking under the integuments and seeking to escape, as causing or inducing some species of cutaneous affection.

Cheĭran'thus, i, m. (Supposed Χείρ, the hand; ἄνθος, a flower; because suited for carrying in the hand.) A Linn. genus of plants, Cl. Tetradynamia; Ord. Siliquosa.

NOTE.—The derivation above stated is that usually given: but besides its silliness, it is not more applicable to wall-flower than to hundreds of other flowers. It is suggested that Cheiri (or Keiri) is the correct and more apt etymon, as already signifying wall-flower, the word ἄνθος being added merely for the sake of producing a more appropriate generic term. See Cheiri.

Cheiran'thus Che'iri. Bot. The systematic name of the wall-flower; the flowers are said to possess nervine and deobstruent virtues; they have a pleasant smell and nauseous bitter taste.

Chĕmia, æ, f. (Χυμία, from χύω, to pour out, or to melt; the general signification of this word having been the art of melting or dissolving solid matter.) Nat. Philos. That branch of natural philosophy called chemistry. See Chemistry. Fr. anal. Chimie, f. Germ. syn. Chemie, or Chymie, f.; Scheidekunst, f.

NOTE.—Other derivations of this word are assigned by authors, as for example, Chemia being a name for Egypt, where, it is said, the art originated: or that it was first taught after the flood, by Cham, whence its name: or that it comes from the Arabic word chema, a secret. That the one first here given is the most probable, is strengthened by the fact that Alchemia, or Alchymia, which is the same word, with the Arabic article Al prefixed by way of eminence, means that branch of chemistry which relates to the transmutation of metals, of course intended to be effected by melting and dissolving. It is also spelled Chymia and Chimia, the first of which is the more correct word, but Chemia is that most in use.

Che'mical. (Chĕmia, chemistry.) Of or belonging to the art, or science of chemistry.) Chĕmĭcus, a, um. Fr. syn. chimique, adj. Germ. syn. chemisch, adj.; scheidekünstlerisch, adj.; zur Scheidekunst gehörig.

Cīmex, ĭcis, m. (Κεῖμαι, to inhabit; because it infests houses.) Entomol. The wall louse or bug; a genus of insects. See Coris. Fr. syn. punaise, f. Germ. syn. Wanze, f., Wandlaus, f.

Cīmex Dŏmes'tĭcus. Entomol. Six or seven of this species have been given internally, to cure ague, just before the fits come on, and like other things which excite disgust, have sometimes proved effectual: the domestic bug. Fr. syn. punaise, f. Germ. syn. Bettwanze, f.; Häuswanze, f.

Cīmĭcĭ'fŭga, æ, f. (Cīmex, a wall-louse; fŭgo, to drive away.) M. Med. Pharmacopœial name (U.S.A.) for the Cimicifuga racemosa, or black snakeroot; used in rheumatic cases, dropsies, chorea, etc. Also, a Linn. genus of plants, Cl. Polyandria; Ord. Monogynia. Juss. Ranunculaceæ.

Cīmĭcĭ'fŭga Răcēmōsa. Bot. The systematic name of a plant, the root of which is used as sedative; also called Actæa racemosa, or black snake-root.

Cĭmōlia. (Κίμωλος, Cimolus, an island in the Cretan sea, where it is found.) Geol. A generic term (terra being understood) for cimolite or Cimolian earth. See Cimolite.

Cĭmōlia Al'ba. White cimolite or Cimolian earth. See Cimolite.

Cĭmōlia Purpŭres'cens. The systematic name of fuller's earth.

Ci'molite. Pharm. A term for fuller's earth of a greyish white colour, consisting of silex, alumina, oxide of iron, and water; formerly used as an astringent; also termed Cimolia terra. Cīmōlĭthītēs, æ, m.

Cĭmōlius, a, um. (Cĭmōlus, an island in the Cretan sea.) Of or belonging to Cimolus: cimo'lian. Geol. Applied to several species of fuller's earth, or Cimolia terra, which was brought from thence. See Cimolia.

Cīna. Bot. A name for the Artemisia santonica, or Tartarian southernwood. Fr. syn. armoise santonique.

Cina Cinæ. See China Chinæ.

Cī'năra, æ, f. (Cĭnăra, the name of a girl who was changed into this herb.) The artichoke. A Linn. genus of plants, Cl. Syngenesia; Ord. Polygamia æqualia. Juss. Carduaceæ. Fr. syn. artichaut, m. Germ. syn. Artischocke, f.

Cī'năra Scōlўmus. The systematic name of the artichoke. See Cynara Articoca, Articocalus, Carduus Altilis, Carduus Chrysanthemus, Carduus Domesticus, Carduus Sativus, Chardon, Costus Nigra. Fr. syn. l'artichaut commun.

Cinaracephalæ. See Cinarocephalus.

Cĭnărŏcĕ'phălus, a, um. (Κινάρα, the artichoke; κεφαλή, the head.) Bot. Artichoke-headed; applied to a Juss. Family (Cinarocephalæ, nom. pl. f.) of plants: cinaroce'phalous. Fr. anal. cinarocéphale, adj.

Cinchōna, æ, f. (Named after the Countess del Cinchon, at Lima, who was signally cured by its use in 1638.) M. Med. The pharmacopœial name (U.S.A.) for several species of Cinchona; Peruvian bark: also called Cortex, Chinchina, China Chinæ, Kina kina, Kinkina, and, by the French, Quinquina. See Antiquartium Peruvianum.

Candianus Pulvis, Cortex Cardinalis De Lugo, Cortex Chinæ Regius. A Linn. genus of plants, Cl. Pentandria; Ord. Monogynia. Juss. Cinchonaceæ. The Cinchona, or Peruvian bark tree. See Calenturas, Cortex Patrum, Gannana, Gannanaperide, Magnum Dei Donum. Fr. anal. quinquina, m. Germ. syn. Chinabaum, m.

NOTE.—There is much confusion and some irreconcileable statements in all the accounts given of the various species of this genus, their names and synonymes. What is here offered therefore can only be regarded as the nearest approximation to correctness practicable.

Cinchōna Calisay'a. M. Med. The new name (Pharm. L.) for the tree which yields the Cinchona flava.

Cinchōna Carībæ'a. Bot. The systematic name of the Caribean bark-tree, growing in Jamaica, and there called sea-side beech; its bark is similar in power to the Peruvian bark, but less astringent.

Cinchōna Cĭnĕ'rea. M. Med. The pharmacopœial name (E.) of the bark of the Cinchona micrantha (D.); the grey-bark, silver-bark, or Huanaco bark.

Cinchōna Condămĭnæ'a. M. Med. The new name (Pharm. L.) for the tree which affords the Cinchona pallida, or pale cinchona bark.

Cinchōna Cordĭfō'lia. M. Med. The systematic name of the heart-leaved cinchona, or Cinchona officinalis. Fr. syn. quinquina de Loxa. Germ. syn. der officinelle Chinabaum.

Cinchōna Cŏrōnæ. M. Med. The pharmacopœial name (E.) for the bark of the Cinchona condaminæa; the crown-bark.

Cinchōna Flāva. M. Med. The pharmacopœial name (E.) for bark obtained from an unascertained species of Cinchona; said (Pharm. L. 1851, & U.S.A.) to be the Cinchona calisaya; therefore called in commerce Calisaya bark; the yellow-bark. Fr. syn. le quinquina calaisaya or jaune royal. Germ. syn. gelbe oder Königs Chinabaum.

Cinchōna Flōrĭbun'da. Bot. The systematic name of the tree which affords the St. Lucia bark; it is astringent and bitter, somewhat like Gentian; used in intermittent fever, typhoid dysentery, and dyspepsia, but requires to be joined with some aromatic substance; in its recent state it is emetic and cathartic.

Cinchōna Lancĭfō'lia. M. Med. The systematic name of the lance-leaved cinchona; the pale Peruvian-bark tree. See Cinchona Pallida. Fr. syn. l'orange quinquina. Germ. syn. der Pomeranzen Chinabaum.

Cinchōna Micran'tha. M. Med. The pharmacopœial name (D.) for the Cinchona cinerea (E.); the grey, Huanaco, or silver bark.

Cinchōna Oblongĭfō'lia. M. Med. The systematic name of the oblong-leaved cinchona; the red Peruvian bark tree. Fr. syn. le rouge quinquina. Germ. syn. der rothe Chinabaum.

Cinchōna Offĭcīnālis. M. Med. Another term for the Cinchona cordifolia. Fr. syn. quinquina de Loxa. Germ. syn. der officinelle Chinabaum.

Cinchōna Pal'lĭda. } M. Med. The pharma-Cinchōna Ru'bra. } copœial names (E.) for pale bark and red-bark obtained from undetermined species of cinchona; the former or pale bark, said (Pharm. L. 1851, & U.S.A.) to be from the Cinchona condaminæa, and the latter from C. micrantha; called in commerce Loxa and Lima bark.

Cinchōna Sanc'ta Fe'. Bot. Name for several species of cinchona at Santa Fé, affording bark, both pale and red.

Cinchonaceæ. See Cinchonaceus.

Cinchōnāceus, a, um. (Cinchōna, the Peruvian bark tree.) Bot. Having an arrangement of parts as in the genus Cinchona; applied to a Juss. Order (Cinchonaceæ, nom. pl. f.) of plants: cinchona'ceous. Fr. anal. cinchonacé, adj.

Cincho'nic. (Cinchōna; terminal -ic.) Of or belonging to cinchona; applied to an acid obtained from all the species of Cinchona; synonymous with Kinic. Cinchōnĭcus, a, um. Fr. anal. cinchonique, adj.

Cincho'nic A'cid. Chem. The same as Kinic acid.

Cinchonin'. (Cinchōna, the Peruvian bark tree.) Chem. A term for a peculiar vegetable principle, or alkali, discovered in the bark of the Cinchona condaminæa; it possesses the same properties as quinine, only in less powerful degree. Cinchōnīna, æ, f. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 4. Fr. anal. cinchonine, f.

Cincin'nus, i, m. (Κίκιννος.) A bush of hair. Anat. Applied to the hair on the temples. See Capillus.

Cin'clĕsis. Pathol. Old term for involuntary winking or nictitation, according to Hippocrates, etc., the same as Cinclisis, and Cinclismus. Fr. anal. cinclèse, f.

Cin'clĭsis, eos, f. } (Κιγκλίζω, to move.) Pa-
Cinclis'mus, i, m. } thol. Old terms for repeated motion of the eyelids. See Cinclesis. Fr. anal. cinclèse, f.; cinclisme, f.

Cĭnĕfĭcātum. (Neut. sing. of Cĭnĕfĭcātus, a, um, made into ashes.) Chem. The same as Calcinatum. Ruland, and Johnson.

Cĭnĕrāria Mărĭ'tĭma. Bot. Name of a plant supposed to be the Achaovan abiat of ancient writers.

Cĭnĕrārium, ii, n. (Cĭnis, ashes.) Name for the ash-pit of a furnace. See Conisterium.

Cĭ'nĕres. (Nom. pl. of Cĭnis, ĕris, m., ash.) M. Med. A name for impure potash; ashes. Fr. syn. cendres, f. pl. Germ. syn. Asche, f.

Cĭ'nĕres Clāvellāti. Term for the wood ashes from which potash is prepared, because the wood has been cut into slips before burning.

Cĭnĕ'reus, a, um. (Cĭnis, the ash remaining after burning any substance.) Of or belonging to ashes; ash-like: cine'reous. Chem., Nat. Philos. Of an ash-colour. Fr. syn. cendre, adj. Germ. syn. aschgrau, adj.

Cineri'tious. (Cĭnis, the ash remaining after burning any substance.) Of or belonging to or resembling ashes. Anat. Of the appearance, or colour of ashes; applied to the cortical substance of the brain, etc. Cĭnĕrĭtius, a, um. Fr. syn. cendré, adj. Germ. syn. aschgrau, adj.

Cĭnĕrĭ'tium, ii, n. (Cĭnis, ashes; because vegetables, or bones, are reduced to ashes in it.) Chem. Old term for a cupel. Ruland.

Cĭnĕ'rŭla, æ, f. (Dim. Cĭnis, ashes.) Chem. Term for the dross of burnt metals, not unlike to ashes; formerly applied to the substance otherwise called Spodium.

Cinetica. See Cineticus.

Cĭnētĭcus, a, um. (Κινέω, to move; terminal -ικὸς.) Having the power of moving; applied to the third Order (Cinetica, nom. pl. n.) of the Cl. Neurotica of Mason Good, including diseases which affect the organs of motion, viz., the muscles: cine'tic. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 6.

Cĭnētus, i, m. Anat. Old name, used by Bartholin, Anat. ii. 3, for the diaphragm.

Cingŭlāria. (Cingŭlum, a girdle; because it grows in that shape.) Bot. A name for a plant supposed to be the Lycopodium selago of Linn.

Cin'gŭlum Mercŭriāle.
Cin'gŭlum Săpien'tiæ.
Cin'gŭlum Stultĭ'tiæ.
Pharm. Old terms for a mercurial girdle invented for the purpose of exciting salivation, described by Hartmannus.

Cin'gŭlum Sanc'ti Jŏhan'nis. Bot. A name for the Artemisia vulgaris. Quincy.

Cĭnis, ĕris, m. (Κόνις, dust.) The ash which remains after burning anything. See Ramag. Fr. syn. cendre, f. Germ. syn. Asche, f.

Cin'nabar. (Κιννάβαρι, the gum of an Indian tree; from its similarity of colour.) M. Med. A term for the red sulphuret or bisulphuret of mercury, as it is met with in nature. Cinnă'băris, is, f. See Alzemafor, Amogabriel, Aremaros, Azamar, Azemasor, Azymar, Magnes Epilepsiæ, Uzifir, Zemasarum, Zengifur, Zinzifur. Fr. anal. cinabre, m. Germ. anal. Zinnober, m.

Cin'nabar, Facti'tious. Chem. Term for this substance when prepared artificially; and when prepared with much care, and reduced to a minute state of division, so as to present the vermilion tint, it constitutes vermilion; the Hydrargyri sulphuretum rubrum. See Kymit Elevatum. Fr. syn. vermillon, m. Germ. syn. das rothe Schwefelquecksilber.

Cin'nabar of An'timony. Chem. Name for Cinnabar, or sulphuret of antimony, which was formed during an old process for making butter of antimony, in which mercury was used. Fr. anal. cinnabre d'antimoine. Germ. syn. Spiessglaszinnober, m.

Cinna'barine. (Cinnăbăris, cinnabar.) Chem., Nat. Philos. Of or belonging to cinnabar; of the colour or appearance of cinnabar, and the light red of the Papaver Orientalis; applied generally to various objects. Cinnăbărīnus, a, um. Fr. anal. cinnabarin, adj.

Cinnabaris, is, f. See Cinnabar.

Cinnă'băris Græcōrum. Old term for the Sanguis draconis. Quincy.

Cinnămōmeus, a, um. (Cinnămōmum, cinnamon.) Of or belonging to cinnamon, of the colour or quality of cinnamon: cinnamo'meous. Fr. syn. canellé, adj. Germ. syn. zimmtfarbig, adj.

Cinnămōmum, i, n. (Arab. Kinamon.) M. Med. Cinnamon, the pharmacopœial name (L.E. & U.S.A.) of the Cinnamomum Zeylanicum; (D.) the Laurus cinnamomum. See Diacinnamomum. Fr. syn. cannelle, f. Germ. syn. Zimmt, m.

Cin'namon. Bot. Name of the bark of the Laurus cinnamomum. Fr. anal. cannelle, f. Germ. syn. Zimmt, m.

Cin'namon Tree. M. Med. Common name for the tree Laurus cinnamomum. Fr. syn. cannellier, m. Germ. syn. Zimmtbaum, m.

Cin'namon Tree, Wild. M. Med. Common name of the Laurus cassia. Fr. syn. fausse cannelle.

Cinquefoil. (Fr. Cinq, five; feuille, a leaf.) Bot. A name for the Potentilla reptans, or five-leaved grass. Fr. syn. quintefeuille, f. Germ. syn. Potentilla.

Ciōn. (Κίων, a column.) Anat. Old name for the uvula. Fr. anal. cionis, f.

Ciŏnis, ĭdis, f. (Dim. Κίων, a column.) Anat. The same as Cion. Pathol. Old term for an enlargement and painful swelling of the uvula. Quincy. Fr. anal. cionis, f.

Ciprīnĭdæ, patron. nom. pl. m. (Cyprīnus, a carp-fish; terminal -idæ.) Ichthyol. Name given to a Family of the Malacopterygii Abdominales, having the Cyprinus or carp-fish for its type.

Circæ'a, æ, f. (Circe, the enchantress; because supposed to have been used by her.) A Linn. genus of plants, Cl. Diandria; Ord. Monogynia. Enchanter's night-shade.

Circæ'a Lutetiāna. Bot. Name for a plant, now fallen into disuse; the Enchanter's night-shade.

Circĭnātus, a, um. (Circĭnor, to be measured, or compassed about.) Bot., M. Med. Measured or compassed about; rounded: cir'cinate. See Cernus Circinatus.

Circin'nus. Anat. A term for the hair on the temples. See Capillus.

Cir'cium Arven'se. Bot. A name for the Serratula arvensis.

Cir'cle. (Circŭlus, a little ring.) A ring. Astron., Geom. A figure bounded with one line only, to which all the right lines that can be drawn from a point to the middle of it, are equal. Trigonom. The periphery of every circle is supposed to be divided into 360 equal parts called degrees. Circŭlus, i, m. Fr. anal. cercle, m. Germ. anal. Zirkel, m.

Circŭlāris, is, e. (Circŭlus, a circle.) Of or belonging to a circle; round: cir'cular. Fr. anal. circulaire, adj. Germ. syn. zirkelförmig, adj.

Circulatio Fœtalis. Physiol. See Circulation, Fetal.

Circula'tion. (Circŭlo, to encircle, or to circulate.) The act, or process of circulating. Physiol. Applied to that vital action by which the blood, poured by the ascending and descending Vena cava into the right auricle of the heart, is sent into the right ventricle; from whence it is transmitted through the pulmonary artery to the lungs, where, having undergone its peculiar change from venous to arterial, it is carried back by the pulmonary vein to the left auricle of the heart, and is then discharged into the left ventricle, whence it is propelled through the aorta to every part of the system, to be returned by the veins to the venæ cavæ as before. Circŭlātio, ōnis, f. See Cyclophoria, Periodus Sanguinis. Fr. anal. circulation, f. Germ. syn. Kreislauf, m.; Umlauf, m.

Circula'tion, Fe'tal. The fetal blood is not distinguishable into venous and arterial, but is everywhere of a brownish red appearance, though otherwise much the same as that of the adult. Proceeding from the placenta, the blood passes through the umbilical vein as far as the liver, where one part passes into this viscus, the other into the vena cava; these two directions carry it to the heart by the inferior vena cava, whence it penetrates into the right auricle, and into the left by the foramen ovale, at the instant in which the auricles are dilated, the blood of the inferior vena cava being at the same moment mixed with that of the superior. By the contraction of the auricles the blood is thrown into the dilated ventricles, which in their turn contract and drive out the blood, the left into the aorta, and the right into the pulmonary artery; but as this terminates in the aorta, it is clear that all the blood of the two ventricles passes into the aorta, except a very small portion that goes into the lungs. Under the influence of these two agents of impulsion, the blood is made to flow through all the ramifications of the aorta, and returns to the fetus by the venæ cavæ. Lastly, it is carried to the placenta by the umbilical arteries and returns to the fetus by the vein of the cord. Circŭlātio Fœtālis. Fr. anal. circulation fœtale. Germ. syn. der Kreislauf des Blutes beim Fœtus.

Circŭlātor, ōris, m. (Circŭlo, to move round.) Old name for a mountebank, or itinerant quack. See Agyrta.

Cir'cŭlātōrium, ii, n. (Circŭlo, to move round about.) Chem. Name for a digesting vessel in which the fluid is made to perform a circulatory motion.

Cir'cŭlus, i, m. (Dim. Circus, a ring.) A little ring. A circle. Anat. Applied to objects, or parts that are of a circular form. Chem. Applied to an iron instrument formerly used for dividing circular portions of glass; the instrument being heated and pressed close to the neck or rod of glass, and then cold applied, division at the point desired was effected. Surg. A name for several circular instruments used by the older surgeons. Fr. anal. cercle, m. Germ. anal. Zirkel, m.

Cir'cŭlus Artēriōsus I'rĭdis. Anat. The arterial circle of the iris; applied to the artery which runs round the iris. Fr. syn. cercle artériel de l'iris.

Cir'cŭlus Cĭliāris. Anat. The ciliary circle. See Ciliary Ligament. Fr. anal. cercle ciliaire; ligament ciliaire. Germ. syn. Strahlenband, n.

Cir'cŭlus Os'seus. Anat. The osseous circle; a name for a ring-like bone at the bottom of the cartilaginous meatus externus of the ear, and supporting the membrana tympani in the fetus: it is united to the meatus in the adult. Fr. anal. cercle osseux.

Cir'cŭlus Qua'drŭplex. Surg. The quadruple, or four-fold circle; an old name for a particular kind of bandage.

Circumcaluālis. Anat. An old term for the Tunica conjunctiva of the eye. Quincy.

Circumci'sion. (Circumcīdo, to cut about.) Surg. Term for the operation of cutting off a circular piece of the prepuce, as is sometimes necessary to be done in cases of Phymosis: also, for the Jewish custom, still practised, of cutting off the prepuce of the Glans penis. Circumcīsio, ōnis, f. Fr. anal. circoncision, f. Germ. syn. Beschneidung, f.

Circumduc'tion. (Circum, about; dūco, to lead.) Anat. A term for a circular movement of a limb. Circumduc'tio, ōnis, f. See Amphisphalsis, Perisphalsis.

Circumductiōnis O'pĭfex. The worker of circumduction; an epithet for the superior oblique muscle of the eye.

Circumflex'a Antĕ'rior. Anat. Name for a branch of the humeral artery distributed to the muscles of the anterior portion of the shoulder-joint; also called Articularis anterior. Fr. syn. artère circonflexe antérieure.

Circumflex'a Exter'na. Anat. Name of an artery arising from the Profunda femoris, or sometimes from the common femoral artery; distributed to the hip and thigh. Fr. anal. artère circonflexe externe. Germ. syn. äussere Kranzpulsader des Schenkels.

Circumflex'a I'lii. Anat. Name of an artery arising from the external iliac artery immediately before it passes under Poupart's ligament; supplying the abdominal, psoas, iliac, and Sartorius muscles; also called Circumflexa ossis ilii, and Iliaca anterior. Fr. syn. artère circonflexe de l'ilium. Germ. syn. Kranzpulsader des Darmbeins.

Circumflex'a Inter'na. Anat. Name of an artery given off from the Profunda, or femoral artery opposite the external circumflex; supplying the hip-joint and muscles surrounding it. Fr. anal. artère circonflexe interne. Germ. syn. innere Kranzpulsader des Schenkels.

(Κλιμακτὴρ, from κλιμάζω, to proceed by degrees, or step by step; terminal -ικὸς.) Physiol. The ordinary term of life, from three score to four score years, was observed to present particular epochs, at which the body is peculiarly affected and suffers considerable change. These were contemplated by the Greek physiologists as five, and termed climacterics, or climacteric periods. The first begins with the seventh year; the second with the twenty-first, or three times seven; the third with the forty-ninth, or seven times seven; the fourth with the sixty-third, or nine times seven; and the fifth with the eighty-first, or nine times nine. The last two were termed grand climacterics, as being those beyond which there was little, or no prospect of life being prolonged. Clīmactērĭcus, a, um. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 6. Fr. anal. climactérique, adj. Germ. anal. klimacterisch, adj.

Clīmacter'ic Disease. Pathol. A term for that sudden change which occurs in many instances of advanced life, by which the patient falls off in flesh and strength before any loss of appetite or dyspeptic symptoms are complained of, and which appear to take place afterwards only by sympathy; it steals on so insensibly that he is scarcely aware of his altered condition until his appetite fails, sleep leaves him, or what there is does not refresh him, his face becomes emaciated or bloated, his tongue white, his pulse more frequent; he has pains in his head and chest, his legs swell, but there is no deficiency in the quantity of the urine, nor any other sensible failure in the action of the abdominal viscera, except that the bowels are more sluggish than they used to be. That this is disease, and altogether distinct from a natural or constitutional decay, is proved by the fact that recovery often takes place; the change referred to generally occurs about the fourth, or in the interval between the fourth and fifth climacteric periods. See Climacteric. Fr. syn. mal climactérique. Germ. syn. Uebel klimacterisch.

Climacteric Year. See Annus Climactericus.

Cli'mate. (Κλίμα, a region.) Astron., Geol. A term for a portion of the earth comprehended between two circles parallel to the equator, so that from the beginning of one climate to that of another next to it, there is half an hour's difference in the longest summer's day; these are also divided into parallels, each of which is just half so much, but the former is small enough to distinguish the different constitution and temperaments of air which this term is generally used to express. Nat. Philos. Term for the prevailing constitution of the atmosphere of any region with respect to heat, cold, moisture, winds, and impregnation with extraneous matter. Clīma, ătis, n. Fr. anal. climat, m. Germ. anal. Klima, n.; syn. Erdstrich, m.; Himmelstrich, m.

Clīmax, ācis, m. (Κλίμαξ, a grade, or a ladder.) Med., Pharm. Applied formerly to certain medicines which increased or diminished the quantity of the substances of which they were compounded, in regular gradation—as of one, ℥iii; of another, ℥ii; of a third, ℥i; and so on. Fr. syn. gradation, f

They are either "true", or "false", and the theory of their being either is thus given by Dr. A. Harvey, of Aberdeen. When a mature ovum is impregnated, an active, sustained and prolonged determination of blood takes place towards the uterus and its appendages. The ruptured ovisac participates in that determination, and in the tendency to growth given by it; the organisable deposit which it contains is thereby placed in circumstances favourable to the exercise of its own inherent power of growth; and thus circumstanced it grows, and is developed into the full sac; the ripe, or "true" corpus luteum. On the other hand, when the ovum is not impregnated it becomes blighted, and is thrown off from the generative organs. No such determination of blood takes place; and the organizable deposit having no great inherent power of growth, and not being placed in circumstances favourable to the exercise of this, either fails to grow at all, or grows only, although very rarely, to the extent characteristic of a "false" corpus luteum. Fr. syn. corps jaunes. Germ. syn. die gelben Körper.

Cri'tical Days. Med. Term formerly, and to some extent still employed for certain days on which the crisis of fever was perfect and favourable, and certain others on which it was imperfect and unfavourable; or others, unmarked by any particular change. Galen reckoned the 7th day as particularly favourable; next the 14th, 9th, 11th, and 20th; then the 17th, the 5th, the 4th, 3rd, and 18th: the 6th, 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th, were very doubtful and unfavourable: the 13th day was intermediate, not indicating one way or other. Diocles and Archigenes regarded the 21st as a favourable day, but Galen agreed with Hippocrates in its rejection, and in the substitution of the 20th. This distinct arrangement, however, is not now in very good repute, the doctrine of critical days being only to a certain limited extent believed. Dies Decrētōrii, D. Indĭces, D. Indĭcātōrii, D. Mĕdĭcīnāles, D. Princĭpes, D. Rădĭcāles. Fr. syn. jours critiques. Germ. syn. kritische Tage einer Krankheit.

Cryptogamia. See Cryptogamius.

Cryptŏgă'mius, a, um. (Κρύπτω, to hide; γάμος, a marriage.) Bot. Applied to a Linn. Class (Cryptogamia, nom. pl. n.) of plants, comprising those whose parts of fructification have not been sufficiently ascertained to refer them to any other class: also, to a grand division (Cryptogamia, nom. pl. n.) of plants in the Juss. system, embracing those which have no flowers, sexual organs, nor embryo, otherwise termed by authors Cellulares, Inembryonatæ, and Acotyledoneæ: cryptoga'mious. Two varieties in the spelling of this term have been employed by authors, Cryptogamicus, cryptogamic, and Cryptogamus, cryptogamous; but this is certainly the proper one as alone strictly consistent with the name of the Linn. Class. See Diss. div. i. s. v. Fr. syn. cryptogame, adj. Germ. syn. kryptogamisch, adj.; zur Kryptogamie gehörig.

NOTE.—The quality hitherto assigned to the names of this and the rest of the Linn. Classes and Orders, and thence of other similarly constituted terms, has been that of a noun feminine of the first declension. Their signification, however, is essentially adjective, as is also, indisputably, the English analogue directly formed from each by the slight alteration of its final syllable.

Cryptor'chis, ītis, m. (Κρύπτω, to conceal; ὄρχις, a testicle.) Physiol. Term for one whose testicles have not descended into the scrotum, but remain in the abdomen; by some faultily spelled Crypsorchis. Fr. anal. crypsorchis, or cryptorchis, m. Germ. syn. ein Mann mit verbogenen Hoden.

Dolphin, Acid of. Chem. See Delphinic Acid.

Domes'tic Medicine. A term for the practice of medicine by those who know nothing of it; of all practices the most mischievous to themselves, or friends. The inevitable tendency of books on this subject is to mislead, to suggest erroneous ideas, fearful convictions, and presumptuous fallacies as to the reader's acquired ability to cure. But besides, they induce a waste of time which may be precious indeed for the safety of the patient; and are, most of them, nearly akin to quackery in the motives of their publication. Common sense is sufficient for all that the non-medical can with safety attempt: where that is deficient, the risk of danger from dabbling in domestic medicine is increased tenfold.

Elambĭcātio, ōnis, f. Chem. Old term for a mode of analysing mineral waters, for the purpose of investigating their qualities, either by the sand bath, or by heat in a glass vessel, as described by Fallopius, de Aq. Therm. i. 9, p. 224: elambica'tion.

Ela'nŭla. Chem. Old name for a kind of very hard alum, like iron.

Elăphŏbos'cum, i, n. (Ἔλαφος, a stag; βόσκω, to feed; because deer eat them greedily.) Bot. Ancient name applied to several umbelliferous plants.

Elăphoscŏ'rŏdon. (Ἔλαφος, a stag; σκόροδον, garlic.) Bot. Old name for a species of Allium; stag's, or viper's garlic.

E'lăphus, i, m. (Ἔλαφος.) Zoöl. The stag. See Cervus Elaphus. Fr. syn. cerf commun. Germ. syn. Edel-hirsch, m.

E'laquir. (Arab.) Chem. Old term for red vitriol. Quincy.

Elas'ma, ătis, n. (Ἐλαύνω, to vex, or fatigue, also, to lead.) Old term for Lamina, or a plate of metal. Surg. A former name, Gr. anal. ἔλασμα, used by Lindenus, Sel. M. ex. iv. § 101, for a clyster-pipe.

Elas'tic. (Ἐλαστής, an impeller, or urger forward; from ἐλαύνω, to urge forward; terminal -ικός.) Chem. Having the property of elasticity, or springiness. Elas'tĭcus, a, um. Fr. anal. élastique, adj. Germ. syn. elastisch, adj.; federkräftig, adj.; spannkräftig, adj.

Elas'tic Fluid. Chem. A term for a gas.

Elas'tic Gum. Bot. A name, or epithet for Caoutchouc, or Indian rubber. Fr. syn. caoutchouc, m. Germ. syn. Federharz, n.

Elasti'city. (Ἐλαστής, an impeller, or urger forward; from ἐλαύνω, to urge forward.) Chem. Term for a property by which bodies return forcibly and of themselves to the same dimensions, or form, they possessed before compression or displacement by any external force. Physiol. Applied to the spirits, when in a buoyant state; also to the perfectly healthful condition of living parts. See Tonicity. Elastī'cĭtas, ātis, f. See Vis Elastica. Fr. anal. élasticité, f. Germ. anal. Elasticität, f.; Schnellkraft, f.; Spannkraft, f.

Elaterin'. Chem. Name given to a crystallisable matter distinct from Elatin, found in the juice of Elaterium. Elātērīna, æ, f. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 4.

Elātērium, ii, n. (Ἐλατήριον; from ἐλαύνω, to stimulate, or incite; from its strong purgative quality.) The pharmacopœial name (L.E.D. & U.S.A.) for the fecula of the Momordica elaterium, now called also Ecbalium officinalis, (Pharm. L. 1851.) Fr. anal. élatérium, m. Germ. syn. der abführende Saft aus Eselsgurken; Eselskurbissaft-Extract.

Elatheria. See Eleutheria.

Elatin'. Chem. Name given to the active principle of Elaterium. Elātīna, æ, f. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 4. Fr. anal. élatine, f.

Elātīne, es, f. (Ἐλάττων, smaller; because it is the smaller species.) Bot. See Antirrhinum Elatine, Alsinastrum.

Elătītes, æ, m. Mineral. A name of a species of Hæmatites, or the bloodstone. See Note Aërolites.

Elbow. (Sax. Elboga.) Anat. See Ancon, and Olecranon.

Elcicorn. See Alcicornes.

Elcōsis, is, or eos, f. (Ἕλκος, an ulcer.) Pathol. Old term for a disease in which large chronic ulcers appear, carious, fetid, and attended with fever. Quincy. This ought to be Helcosis.

Elder, Dwarf. Bot. Common name for the Sambucus ebulus, or Danewort. See Chamæacte. Fr. syn. l'hyèble. Germ. syn. Attich, m.; Niederholder, m.

Elder Tree. M. Med. The common name of the Sambucus nigra. See Alcte. Fr. syn. sureau noir. Germ. syn. der schwarze, or gemeine Hohlunder.

Elecam'pane. M. Med. The common name for the plant Inula helenium.

Elect. Med., Pharm. An abbreviation, used in prescriptions, of Electuarium, an electuary.

Elective Affinity. Chem. See Affinity.

Elective Attraction. Chem. See Attraction.

Electrical Air. Nat. Philos. See Aura Electrica.

Electri'city. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber; in which it was first observed.) Nat. Philos. A property by which certain bodies when rubbed, excited, or heated, attract others, and frequently emit sparks and streams of light. Electri'cĭtas, ātis, f. Fr. anal. électricité, f. Germ. anal. Elektricität, f.

Elec'tro-Bio'logy. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by means of which electricity was discovered, and took its name; βίος, life; λόγος, a discourse.) This compound may be rendered the doctrine of the influence of electricity on life; pretending as it is, however, it is only employed as a synonyme for animal magnetism and its train of aliases.

Elec'tro-Che'mical Ac'tion. A term for chemical action induced by electrical arrangements.

Elec'tro-Mag'netism. Term applied to a series of interesting phenomena connected with the production of magnetism by electricity. Fr. anal. électromagnetisme, m.

Electrodes. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by means of which electricity was first discovered; ὁδός, a way.) A term employed in Electro-chemical action, for the boundaries of the decomposing matter in the direction of the electric current; being regarded as the roads or ways by which electricity passes. As adj. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber; terminal -ώδης.) Physiol. Old term, Gr. anal. ἠλεκτρώδης, used by Hippocrates, Epid. vi. xxii. 16, for alvine feces, or stools, which, shining and recent, resembled amber. See Diss. div. i. s. iv.

Electrŏgĕ'nĕsis, is, f. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by which electricity was discovered; γίνομαι, to be begotten, born, or produced.) Physiol. The produce, or effect of electricity; a term given to a particular state of the spinal marrow, or of muscular nerves, observed under the following circumstances. If the spinal marrow, or the lumbar nerves, be denuded and insulated in the frog, and a voltaic current be passed through them for ten or twenty minutes, and the voltaic influence be then withdrawn, the lower limbs instantly pass into a continuous state of rigid tetanus, or tetanoid spasm: and so it is styled Electrogenesis, or the electrogenic state.

Electroge'nic. (Electrŏgĕnĕsis; terminal -ĭcus.) Physiol. Of or belonging to the particular state named Electrogenesis. Electrogĕ'nĭcus, a, um. See Diss. div. ii. s. vi. t. 6. Fr. anal. électrogénique, adj.

Electrŏgĕnium, ii, n. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by means of which electricity was dicovered; γεννάω, to beget.) Nat. Philos. Term for the unknown cause of the phenomena of electricity: elec'trogen. Fr. anal. électrogène, m. Germ. syn. die elektrische Materie.

Elec'trolytes. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber; by means of which electricity was first discovered; λυτὸς, loosed, from λύω, to release.) Nat. Philos. A term applied to bodies which can be decomposed directly by electricity. Pl. of Electrō'lўtum, i, n.

Elec'trolyzed. (Same as in preceding term.) A term applied to bodies that are electrochemically decomposed.

Electro'meter. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by means of which electricity was first discovered; μέτρον, a measure.) Nat. Philos. Name of an instrument, variously formed, for ascertaining the quality and quantity of electricity in an electrified body. Electrō'mĕtrum, i, n. Fr. anal. électromètre, m. Germ. syn. Electricĭtätsmesser, m.

Electrŏ'phŏrus, i, m. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by means of which electricity was discovered; φορέω, to bear.) Nat. Philos. Term given to an apparatus employed in electric experiments; an electricity-bearer: an elec'trophore. Fr. anal. électrophore, m.

Elec'troscope. (Ἤλεκτρον, amber, by means of which electricity was first discovered; σκοπέω, to spy.) Nat. Philos. Name of an instrument for ascertaining the presence of electricity. Electro'scŏpus, i, m. Fr. anal. électroscope, m.

Elec'trum, i, n. (Ἤλεκτρον, from ἠλέκτωρ, the sun; from its splendour.) A name for Succinum, or amber. Fr. syn. ambre, m.; succin, m. Germ. syn. Bernstein, m.

Elec'trum Minĕrāle. Chem. Old name for the tincture of metals; made of tin and copper, to which some add gold and double its quantity of martial regulus of antimony melted together; from all which there is produced a metallic mass thus called; the mass is powdered and detonated with nitre and charcoal, to a kind of scoria; it is powdered again whilst hot, and then digested in spirit of wine, whence a tincture is obtained of a fine red colour.

Elec'tuary. (Elĭgo, to chuse, or pick out.) Pharm. A confection, or conserve. Electuārium, ii, n. See Eclegma, Linctus. Fr. anal. électuaire, m. Germ. syn. Lattwerge, f.

Elēen'cĕphol. (Ἔλαιον, oil; ἐγκέφαλος, the brain.) Chem. Name given to a distinct fat contained in the brain, and found to contain phosphorus and sulphur.

Elĕlis'phăcos. (Ἐλελίσφακος.) Bot. Old name for a kind of sage.

E'lements. Chem. Rudiments, or first principles, substances which cannot be farther decomposed by chemical analysis. Elĕmen'ta, nom. pl. of Elĕmen'tum, i, n. Fr. anal. éléments, m. pl. Germ. anal. Elemente, n. pl.

Elēmi, Indecl. (Ethiopian.) M. Med. The pharmacopœial name (L.E.) of a concrete resinous substance obtained by exudation from one or more unascertained plants; (D.) the Amyris elemifera, Resina. See Chibou. Fr. anal. élémi, m. Germ. anal. Elemi, n.; syn. Elemiharz, m.; Oelbaumharz, m.

Eleŏsĕlinum, i, n. (Ἕλος, a lake; σέλινον, parsley.) Bot. A name for the Apium graveolens, or smallage. Fr. syn. ache, f. Germ. syn. wilder Eppich.

Elĕphan'tia, æ, f. Pathol. Old term for a kind of Anasarca; also for Elephantiasis.

Elĕphan'tia A'răbum. Pathol. Old term for Elephantiasis, when the feet are swelled and hard; they are held as synonymous in Cullen's Nosology. Fr. anal. éléphantiasis des Arabes.

Elĕphanti'ăsis, is, f. (Ἐλέφας, the elephant.) Pathol. A term which has been applied to two distinct diseases of very opposite character, which are now designated as Elephantiasis Arabum, and Elephantiasis Græcorum. See Lazari Morbus, Phœnicius Morbus. Fr. anal. éléphantiasis, m. Germ. anal. Elephantiasis, n.; Knollsucht, f.

Elĕphanti'ăsis A'răbum. Pathol. A term for the disease Barbadoes Leg; also called Elephantia Arabum. Fr. anal. éléphantiasis des Arabes. Germ. syn. der Arabische Aussatz.

Elĕphantiă'sis Græcōrum. Pathol. Term for a disease characterised by shining tubercles of various size and of a dusky red or livid colour, occurring on the face, ears, and extremities; together with a thickened rugous state of the skin, a diminution or total loss of its sensibility, and the loss of hair, except what is on the scalp; also called Lepra Arabum. From the hideous deformity which is gradually produced on the countenance, this disease has been called Satyriasis, and Leontiasis, as if resembling a satyr, or a wild beast. See Juzam, Tyriasis. Fr. anal. éléphantiasis des Grecs.

Elĕphanti'ăsis Ită'lĭca. Pathol. A term for the disease Pelagra. See Pelagra. Fr. syn. éléphantiasis d'Italie.

Elephantiasis of the Scrotum. Pathol. See Andrum.

Elĕphan'tĭnum Emplas'trum. Pharm. Old name of a plaster. See Elephantinus.

Elĕphan'tĭnus, a, um. Pharm. Name, Gr. syn. ἐλεφάντινος, applied by Aëtius, to a plaster, made of cerusse, wax, oil and water. Gorræus.

E'lĕphas, antis, m. (Ἐλέφας, Alchemical name for Aqua fortis.) Pathol. Formerly a name for Elephantiasis. Fr. anal. éléphantiasis, m. Germ. syn. Elephantiasis, f.; Knollsucht, f. Zoöl. The elephant. Fr. and Germ. anal. Elephant, m.

Eler'sna. (Arab.) Alchemical name of Molybdenum. Ruland, and Johnson.

Eles'matis. (Arab.) Chem. Alchemical name of burnt lead. Ruland, and Johnson.

Elettāri. (Malab.) Bot. A name for the Elettaria cardamomum, or lesser cardamum; now called Alpinia cardamomum.

Elettāria, æ, f. (Elettari, the Malabar word for the lesser cardamom.) Name of a new genus of plants, Cl. Monandria; Ord. Monogynia. Juss. Scitamineæ.

Elettāria Cardămōmum. M. Med. A name given by Dr. Maton to the lesser cardamom plant, formerly referred to the genus Alpinia. See Alpinia Cardamomum, Elettari.

Eleuteria, æ, f. } M. Med. See Croton, Cas-
Eleutheria, æ, f. } carilla.

Elevātor, ōris, m. (Elĕvo, to lift.) Anat. See Levator. Surg. Name of an instrument for raising any depressed portions of bone, particularly of the skull: an e'levator. Elĕvātōrium, ii, n. Fr. anal. élévatoire, m. Germ. syn. Erheber, m.; Hebeisen, n.

Elĕvātio, ōnis, f. (Elĕvo, to lift up.) Chem. Old term for sublimation: eleva'tion. Med. Applied the same as Diastole. Fr. anal. élévation, f. Germ. syn. Erhebung, f. Surg. Applied to swelling or enlargement, as of the liver, or spleen, according to P. M. de Calderia, Oper. ii. 14. Germ. syn. Geschwulst, f.

Elĕvātōrium, ii, n. (Elĕvo, to lift up. Surg. An elevator; the instrument so called. Fr. anal. élévatoire, m. Germ. syn. Hebeisen, n.

Elibanum. See Olibanum.

NOTE.—This word is declared by Kuhn to be the accusative of Encephalos, and therefore erroneously used by the moderns. It seems more probable, however, to be adopted from the neuter of the adjective ἐγκέφαλος, as here stated, and to have been intended by its author to be more distinctive of the cerebrum (with which it agrees in gender), although it must be held equally with the masculine ἐγκέφαλος, to express the collective contents of the cranium. There is no Greek noun of this orthography, as implied in the remark by Kühn, but only the adjective ἐγκέφαλος, and Rufus Ephesius uses the expression ἐγκέφαλος μυελὸς, the marrow in the head, or the brain. It is worthy of consideration whether the distinction ought not to be maintained, by which Encephalon should express the cerebrum, and Encephalos, the general contents of the cranium.

Encĕ'phălos, i, m. ('Εν, in; κεφαλή, the head.) Anat. The analogue of the masculine of the Greek adjective ἐγκέφαλος, that which is in the head; and with μυελὸς, signifying the marrow in the head; thus, anciently, and often now employed as a term for the cerebrum; properly, however, it stands for the whole contents of the skull, the Cerebrum, Cerebellum, Pons Varolii, Medulla oblongata, their membranes, vessels, and nerves. See Encephalon and Note. Fr. anal. encéphale, m.

Encephălōsis, is, f. (Ἐγκέφαλος, the brain, or that which is within the head.) Pathol. Term for a disease characterised by a tumour of a brain-like substance perceptible on examination, or by its effect upon adjacent organs. Germ. syn. die Bildung des Encephalons.
